Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee the reason for increasing the compensation of the superintendent of police from $4,000 to $4,500, particularly in view of the fact, as I am advised, that that official indicated by a letter and also stated before the committee that he did not solicit this increase? Is there any reason why the committee added this amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is true the superintendent of police did write the committee a letter, which is in our files, stating that he had no interest in the increase. I think, though, it is in accordance with the facts—and the chairman of the subcommittee will bear me out in the statement—that the compensation of the superintendents of police of the various cities of the United States exceeds either by a thousand or more dollars the compensation of $4,000, which is the present pay for the chief of police of this city.

Mr. CALDER. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. And we thought it proper to make this increase of $500, which will still leave the salary much less than that received in other cities which are the size of Washington. It is still, I think, not out of proportion.

Mr. CALDER. That is true. In Detroit, for instance, the chief of police is paid $7,500; in Boston the same amount; in Philadelphia, $4,500; and in Chicago, $8,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not move to amend the bill as it has been reported by the committee. I rose primarily, however, to state that this morning when unanimous consent was asked for the consideration of this bill at an evening session I ventured to object to its consideration, hoping that an opportunity would be had of taking the bill up to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. I understood that we were to have a very protracted session this afternoon in the discussion of the peace treaty, and I thought also that if any attempt were made to consider this bill this evening it would be abortive because of the long session devoted to the consideration of the treaty.

I am very glad that this bill has come before the Senate for consideration. I have given some little attention to the splendid work, generally speaking, performed by the policemen of this city, and I avail myself of this opportunity to pay tribute to the most excellent work which they have done.

I desire to express one other view. I think it would be a very wise thing if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia could see their way clear at some time to appoint the superintendent of police from the ranks. I think it is a mistake to place as superintendents of police men who have had absolutely no experience with the work involved in protecting the city and caring for policemen. I am not speaking at all with reference to Maj. Pullman, the present occupant of this position, but I think that, so far as possible, efforts ought to be made to select men for this responsible position from the ranks. The men who go in and work their way up ought to have an opportunity some day of becoming superintendents or, at any rate, they ought to feel that the opportunity is afforded them. From my information, however, the policy has been pursued in this city of importing somebody into this office, to take a newspaper correspondent or somebody who knows absolutely nothing about the work involved in the police department. I should like to see promotions from the ranks; and I should like to see men have the opportunity of reaching this highest station within the limits of this bill. I had hoped that the next appointment made would be from the ranks instead of from outside the ranks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to join in the hope expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in that respect. It seems to me that if there is any position that ought to be filled by promotion from the ranks it is that of superintendent of the police force. I can not conceive of better training for that position than that which is derived from service and experience in the ranks through the different grades. I repeat, I wish to join very heartily with the Senator from Utah in the expression of the hope that that course may be taken hereafter. My recollection is that when I first came to Washington Maj. Sylvester was chief of police of the District, and my impression is that he had served for a long while on the police force before he became chief of police. I am not sure about that, but, at any rate, he had a most excellent reputation as chief of police, and I think that was due largely to the service that he had had with the force.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I take pleasure in joining in the commendation expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] of the splendid service rendered by the police force of the District. I think the policemen of the District have rendered excellent and faithful service in the protection of the people and in behalf of the maintenance of law in the District, and I am glad to see them get some increase of compensation. They are a good lot of men and are, as a rule, faithful officers.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CALDER, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will it be necessary, before we take a recess, to return to open executive session?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Provision was made for that in the unanimous-consent agreement adopted before the recess was taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it was included in the unanimous-consent agreement adopted before the recess this afternoon that at the conclusion of the consideration of the police salary bill the Senate would recess as in open executive session until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Therefore the Senate stands in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Thereupon (at 9 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 12, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, November 11, 1919.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

In the absence of the Chaplain, the Members, at the request of the Speaker, joined in repeating the Lord's Prayer.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to present a privileged resolution.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman must state his question of personal privilege first.

Mr. BLANTON. The question of personal privilege is this, Mr. Speaker: By being graciously allowed to do so by the House yesterday Mr. Victor L. Berger delivered a speech from the floor of this House which from the beginning to its end teemed with disloyal utterances against the Government and Constitution of the United States of America, and I am asking in this privileged resolution that the speech be not allowed the franking privilege.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a privileged resolution, a resolution of the highest privilege. This speech appears in the RECORD this morning. Under the usual franking privilege, this resolution not being adopted, it could be sent to the uttermost parts of this country under frank.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman cite to the Chair an authority that makes the franking privilege a matter of privilege of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's resolution is not in order under the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit upon the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that every utterance on the floor of this House that goes into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if permitted by the House to remain in that RECORD, is under the rules of the House entitled to the franking privilege, and that that privilege extends up to the very moment this House sees fit to take it from the RECORD. This House is the judge of everything that goes into the RECORD and which shall remain in the RECORD as a part of its proceedings, and can control what of same is entitled to the franking privilege. If it were a matter that went into the RECORD not under the graciousness of this House, this House would have no control over it; but it being a matter that appeared in the RECORD under the permission of this House, as a part of its own proceedings, this House has absolute control over it at any time and at all times.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Then I will yield to the gentleman. And until the permanent RECORD is made up and printed and published this House certainly has control over everything that appears in it as a part of the proceedings of the House.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that we can withhold the franking privilege about any matter simply by a House resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. As to the matter that appears in the RECORD, entitled to the franking privilege, matter that appears there by reason of being a part of the proceedings of this House, only the House has jurisdiction over it.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman seeks to withhold the franking privilege from something that has been uttered in the House. Of course, the franking privilege is a matter of law, and can only be limited by joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. The House certainly has control over every bit of its own proceedings.

Mr. WALSH. The House could strike out or eliminate.

Mr. BLANTON. The House could strike out or eliminate or circumscribe by limitation. It refused yesterday to strike out. It has a right to place any limitations it sees fit on its own proceedings.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that what the gentleman from Massachusetts says is unanswerable, that the House can not control the franking privilege, which is a matter of law.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 3844. An act for the relief of Della James.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it would be in order under the rule.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It will take just half a second—not for to-day, but for a later day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt whether, under the rule that has been adopted, the Chair has the right to recognize any request for unanimous consent. The Chair will consider that question, if the gentleman will postpone his request, and arrive at a decision to cover all requests.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the rule the House automatically, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of such privileged matters as are on the Speaker's table and the disposition of conference reports, resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union until the conclusion of the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. That was at the beginning. The Chair was in doubt about whether later the action would be automatic. The rule said that on the adoption of this rule the House automatically resolves itself, and it would be a continuing order. The Chair would be disposed to think that after the first day it would require a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the motion to go into Committee of the Whole would be in order immediately following the disposition of the privileged matters referred to.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, known as the railroad bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, known as the railroad bill, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the first reading of the bill is dispensed with. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill that we present to the House for consideration to-day, known as the railroad bill, has been the subject of long deliberation and of careful consideration on the part of the subcommittee and the full committee.

In opening my remarks I respectfully ask that I may be permitted to proceed without interruption. [Applause.] If those who are here now will kindly pass that request along to Members as they come in the request will be complied with.

The task presented to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in connection with finding a proper solution for the adjustment of the so-called railroad problem was one of great complexity and of infinite difficulty. We sought advice and facts from every possible source. The hearings began on the 15th of July and extended to the 27th day of September, running continuously mornings and afternoons without intermission.

During that long period scores of witnesses were heard, and these witnesses came not from a single section but from all parts of the United States. They represented not a single interest but many interests. They came representing various organizations, among them railroad organizations, financial organizations, commercial bodies, trade-unions, labor, agriculture. In fact, all interests presented their respective claims for consideration before the committee. They came voluntarily, for our committee did not ask of the House the power to subpœna witnesses, nor did we ask the House for an appropriation to pay counsel, accountants, or other experts. The only expense connected with this long investigation, outside, of course, of the official committee stenographers, was a small sum for telegraphing. Otherwise this investigation cost the Government not a single dollar. We did not need the subpœna power in order to secure witnesses. They came in abundance.

A remarkable thing about the testimony was the high average character of witnesses and of the facts and arguments they presented. For this reason these hearings are of particular value, and I commend them to you and to the country for most careful consideration.

When these hearings began there was only one bill pending before the committee, namely, H. R. 4378, introduced by myself on the 2d day of June. There was no other bill relating to the railroads, as a whole, introduced until after the hearings had been well started, when a bill was introduced by request by Judge SIMS, incorporating the so-called Plumb plan. These were the only bills that were presented in the House for consideration. But this does not mean that there were not other bills and other drafts of bills presented for the consideration of the committee, for there were two or three Senate bills incorporating certain plans, and these plans were explained by their respective exponents in great detail. By the time the hearings had been half concluded not less than a half dozen plans, as represented by bills introduced in Senate or House, or as represented by draft plans, were before the committee for its consideration. Besides these six or seven bills, or drafts of bills proposing plans, there were presented no less than 100 pages of amendments to the original bill—H. R. 4378. I state these facts merely to indicate the size and extent of the task that was imposed upon the committee in arriving at a solution of the question. With reference to these various plans the committee adopted this procedure, namely, that these should first be heard before we should give consideration to any particular feature of the general plan. As a result, we heard the proponents of these plans, namely, the transportation-conference plan, presented by a committee composed of members of the United States Chamber of Commerce; the so-called Warfield plan, proposed by owners of railway securities, presented by an organization of which Mr. J. Davies Warfield, of Baltimore, is the president; the so-called railway executives' plan, presented by Mr. Alfred P. Thom, general counsel of the Railway Executive Committee of the Railroads of the United States, which represents something like 90 per cent of the railroad mileage of the United States. Then there was the so-called Amster plan, presented by Mr. Nathan Amster, of Boston, and appearing in bill form in the bill introduced by Senator LENROOT. Then there was the so-called Rich plan, or the New England plan, presented by Edgar J. Rich, of Boston, dealing, however, more particularly with the feature of new loans for the corporations after Federal control ceases. Then there was the plan that is embodied in the pending Senate bill, known as the Cummins plan, and there was also the Plumb plan, as presented in the bill introduced by Judge SIMS by request. These are not all the plans, but they are the leading ones. There were others that varied from these six leading plans.

After the hearings had been concluded, a subcommittee was appointed, consisting of five members, to make a survey of the whole field and seek to put in concrete form the leading features of the proposed legislation. That subcommittee labored for four weeks and submitted to the full committee, less than two weeks ago, the results of its labors, which are very largely embodied in the pending bill.

There was at the beginning a question as to whether or not the committee should give serious consideration to the question of Government ownership. In view of the fact that the President, in his message delivered to the House early this year, had declared his intention to return the railroads by the first of next year; in view of the fact that the carriers themselves were eager to get out from under Federal control; and the further fact that the shipping world, as indicated by chambers of commerce, traffic clubs, and individuals, desired an end of Federal control, the committee came to the conclusion that it would give to Government ownership only cursory consideration, and such consideration as was necessary in connection with the bill introduced by Judge SIMS, which, by the way, was the only bill presented to the committee involving the question of Government ownership.

Notwithstanding our purpose not to devote much time to the question of Government ownership, we gave to the proponents of the Plumb plan six days of hearings. As a result of those hearings, and of the cross-examination of the advocates of the plan, the committee were more firmly convinced than ever that Government ownership is not and ought not to be the solution of the problem. [Applause.] But the Plumb plan goes much further than Government ownership. It involves the question of employee operation. Socialism, so far as it has manifested itself in the regulation of public utilities, goes no further than Government ownership and regulation of facilities through such agencies as the Government may prescribe, but socialism has not yet gone to the extent of demanding that there shall be employee operation. We therefore came to the conclusion that the socalled Plumb plan was impossible. [Applause.]

We next considered these various other plans with a view of seeing if they contained something of advantage and something that would enable us to meet the pending situation and to build upon that something a superstructure for the future.

I have had published in the report a comparative synopsis of the various plans to which I have already referred. The synopsis was prepared by Mr. Richard Waterman, the secretary of the railroad committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce. While it is not complete, it gives you the salient features of the various principal plans and at the same time enables you to discover the coincidences and differences. A cursory review of the synopsis will indicate at once that all the plans agree upon the return of the roads to private ownership and operation, with the exception of the Plumb plan. All of the plans, including the Plumb plan, favored giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of regulating rates. All of the plans, including the Plumb plan, gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right of regulation of railroad securities, including stocks and bonds. But when you leave those three distinctive features you find much diversity in the several plans.

The bill we present to you agrees with these six or seven plans in that the pending bill gives to the commission power over the issue of stocks and bonds and gives to the commission the power to regulate rates, fares, and charges, so that the pending bill is in accord with all of these several plans in these two major respects.

One distinctive feature that stands out in several of these plans is the creation of a transportation board, a board separate and distinct from the Interstate Commerce Commission, with certain powers now exercised by the commission. The arguments that were presented to us in support of the transportation board run along these lines: As the Interstate Commerce Commission is a heavily worked body, it should be relieved of its tasks by taking from it certain administrative functions relating to the administration of the safety-appliance acts, the boiler-inspection act, the hours-of-service act, and other acts that have been passed and are being administered by the commission. With a transportation board which would be largely an administrative body, it could take over these administrative functions heretofore exercised by the commission. In addition, as the Interstate Commerce Commission is a quasi judicial body, it should not be burdened with administrative functions. That is the argument in support of the transportation board which can be met, in our opinion, by the statement that the administration of these various acts, like the safety-appliance act, the hours-of-service act, the boiler-inspection act, and so forth, have been satisfactory, and I have heard of no complaint that these acts have not been administered with complete success. For that reason it would not be a sufficient justification to deny the commission the exercise of these administrative functions which it has exercised ever since the several acts were enacted into law.

It is again asserted that the transportation board is necessary because it would have a broader, wider view of the whole subject of transportation by rail, by highway, and by water; that it could be a body that could look into the financial needs of the carriers as a whole, or by groups, or by systems or regions; that it could frame a budget based on the financial needs, by systems or by regions; and that it could then submit those budgets to the Interstate Commerce Commission with a mandate that the commission should fix such a level of rates as would meet the financial needs of the several carriers or groups. Our committee has not gone on any such theory. We do not believe that it is wise to divide the functions between the Interstate Commerce Commission and another body. We believe that there is no body of men in the United States that knows so well the financial needs of the carriers or knows their operating difficulties and their operating problems so well as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Your independent body, no matter how able it might be personally, would have to take years to acquire the information already possessed by the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I fear if we create a separate and independent body like the transportation board, we would divide the responsibility, and that is a thing we should avoid. It seems to me almost impossible to so differentiate the functions of the board and of the commission as to avoid misunderstandings and jealousies which would result in inefficiency and loss to the Government and to the people of the United States. I do not believe that a transportation board should be created, as was suggested by the distinguished representative of the railway executives' committee. His plan and theory was that you wanted a transportation board, another body which could exercise certain functions of control, and could say to the commission, "You must raise the rates to such a level." The commission could then say to any complainant or to a disappointed public, "We could not help it. The transportation board exacted its demand, and so we are fortified."

The Interstate Commerce Commission does not need to be fortified by the creation of an independent body like a transportation board. The action of the commission since its foundation has been fearless in the interest of the public and of the carrier, and the one most noteworthy thing running through the long array of testimony of over 3,500 pages is the uniform approval of the high character and efficiency of the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

The transportation board is not found in the pending bill. I should say that the transportation board is a characteristic of the executives' plan, of the transportation-conference plan, and of the Senate bill plan. It is not, however, a part of the so-called Warfield plan, which contemplates the creation of an association, of which association the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission should constitute a part.

The next feature which is prominent in some of the plans is so-called Federal incorporation. This is not a new suggestion by any manner of means. It was first prominently proposed by the railway executives in the hearings before the Newlands Joint Commission in 1916, and the fundamental purpose of presenting the idea of Federal incorporation by the railway executives at that time was the elimination of the so-called 48 masters, namely, the regulatory bodies of the several States. That was the same purpose shown by the representatives of the railway executives and others in presenting the testimony before the committee in the recent hearings. And why do they want to get rid of the 48 masters? I concede that some of the regulations of the States has proven unnecessarily burdensome to the carriers, without bringing compensating benefits. Especially is this true with reference to the State regulation of operation, of enactment of safety-appliance laws, of full-crew bills, and matters of that kind, and more particularly with reference to the issuance of stocks and bonds, as to which feature I shall speak more in detail a little later on.

There was justification on the part of the railway companies in seeking to be relieved from the conflicting and the varying enactments of the 48 sovereign States, but, so far as the exercise of police powers on the part of the several States is concerned, there should be no interference by Federal authority. The States have a field here peculiarly their own, and have occupied it and doubtless will be permitted to occupy it, but in a larger way the committee did not believe that the time had come to enact legislation that would practically wipe out the authority and control of the several States. It may come in time. It seems to me that the legislation of Congress in recent years, supplemented and possibly hastened by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Shreveport, the South Dakota, and the Minnesota rate cases, is hastening the day when State control over common carriers will be vastly lessened. However, even though the trend is now that way, the committee felt that the natural processes should be permitted to have their course rather than that we should, by a revolutionary stroke and at a given time, wipe out the jurisdiction of the several States. The pending bill, therefore, does not embrace the doctrine of Federal incorporation.

There was grave doubt expressed by the witnesses who appeared before the committee and in learned briefs submitted to the committee as to the constitutionality of Federal incorporation. Learned counsel were to be found on each side of the proposition. I am not here to discuss that phase of the problem because it is unnecessary in view of the fact that the bill does not contain a provision for Federal incorporation. We were opposed to it because of the delay and the expense and the doubt as to law that would be involved if we adopted that as a part of our bill. Here are charters granted by States because of the sovereign power of the States to grant charters. Here are stockholders of that corporation enjoying the peculiar advantages and privileges which such State charters grant. Are they, or would they be, willing to surrender the privileges and advantages they are legally enjoying under the State charter and be compelled to surrender them and be practically forced into a Federal incorporation by the use of the right of eminent domain without objection? No. In every corporation chartered by the States there would be found recalcitrant stockholders who would say, "We will stand by our charter and by our State corporation, and you will have to compel us to surrender by the power of law." That would mean a lawsuit, and a lawsuit would not end in your district court but would have to run its weary length along to the Supreme Court, involving a delay of at least two years. We did not think it wise to incorporate in this bill a proposition that might involve such delays, such expense, and such litigation. Hence it has been omitted.

Then, in that same connection there was involved the question of taxation. If under Federal incorporation you create a Federal entity the question might arise whether that Federal entity would be subject to a State tax. There would be no question about the right of the Federal Government to tax its own creature, but we have been very sensitive heretofore in seeing that nothing is done to deprive the States of the right of taxation of the common carrier. In fact in the Federal-control act we put in a specific exception to the effect that the State's right to tax these common carriers, even though they are interstate in character, should not be called in question. This, too, was another reason which induced us to eliminate from the provisions of the bill the matter of Federal incorporation.

Another characteristic feature of these several plans, which was found in practically all of them, was the question of consolidations or mergers with a possible resultant pooling of traffic, earnings, and equipment. The matter of consolidations or mergers as to carriers is rather a new doctrine in these days because, as you know, the original interstate-commerce act of 1887 made pooling unlawful. That provision was placed in that law because of the experiences of the country in connection with traffic associations which had wide sway and potency something over 30 years ago, and all these years we have strictly held to the letter of the law that there shall be no consolidations and mergers and no pooling. But our ideas have doubtless been changed with reference to consolidations and mergers as they have been changed with reference to many other things as the result of our war experience. No sooner had the Federal-control act become operative than the President, through the director general, exercised the powers we gave him of putting all of the railroads of the United States, interstate in character, under a common control and management, one vast merger, and at the same time the President exercised the power of pooling traffic, earnings, and equipment, to the end that there might be a unified system of control over carriers and over the business which they did, in order that we might win the war. While that power, exercised by the President through the director general, has given rise to much complaint on the part of the shipping public and of individuals, and while it has not worked out as one would like to have had it work out, nevertheless I think we all believe it was necessary to make the consolidation and permit the pooling in order to meet the emergency of war and to bring troops and supplies to all the ports along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and to send troops from various parts of the country to their camps and cantonments.

But to-day the question is presented to us, "Shall we retain consolidations, mergers, and poolings when peace shall again be with us?" There are two ideas about the subject. There is one school that believes that the consolidation should be compulsory, pursuant to the mandate of an official body or board. There is another school that believes that the consolidations or mergers should be permissive, voluntary.

There are difficulties in connection with compulsory consolidation; the same difficulties, I fear, that are connected with compulsory Federal incorporation, difficulties which involve of necessity delays and costs. Our idea is not to have compulsory consolidations or poolings of traffic earnings or equipment, but rather to have permissive voluntary consolidations, subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, if the commission decides that such consolidation or merger or pooling was in the public interest and would result in more economy of administration and in every way be of greater service. That is the doctrine on which the pending bill is framed.

There are, however, two plans that were presented involving compulsory consolidation. These are the plans of the railway executives and the pending Senate bill after the lapse of seven years, during which time the merger may be voluntary. I do not know what the stronger roads would do to the weaker roads during those seven years.

It does not appeal to me to have these voluntary consolidations along the lines of systems or of regions. The plans are to divide the country up into systems or regions for administration and rate-making purposes. Gentlemen, there are very grave difficulties from the administrative standpoint in regional consolidation. The consolidation must, of course, be of average condition, so that your region would have average conditions, and make it possible for the administrative body more easily to administer the law. But how hard it would be to create a region where we would have such average conditions. I have in mind New England, which would, no doubt, be made into a group or a system. With the agriculture and timber interests of north Maine and the tremendous manufacturing interests in the densely populated cities of Massachusetts and Connecticut you would have to average conditions and you would put up that problem to your administrative body. But that is not the only difficulty. These regions are supposed to follow the lines of existing systems, so as to incorporate at least two competitive lines, and give our large centers a certain degree of competition. But these regions would naturally be framed along east and west lines, especially in official and western classification territory, where the trunk-line systems run practically east and west. What would you do with a system that is at right angles with the trunk lines east and west? How would you put the Rock Island, which runs through seven or eight States and from far north to far south? How would you put that through a region which would permit it to be regulated as to rates by any commission? How about the Illinois Central, running from Chicago down to the Gulf, and the Seaboard and the Coast Line and the Southern and the Louisville & Nashville with its connections? Those roads run north and south athwart the trend of commerce. I fear that the complexity of the problem of establishing regions or systems is so great that it would fall of its own weight. The rate-making system is difficult enough as it is now. This new method would make it insolvable.

We do not believe that there is the same feeling of objection to pooling that there was prior to the war. There can be pooling of traffic, earnings, and equipment under the regulation of the commission that should be of benefit to the carriers. It is in this way that we hope that the commission may be able to solve the problem of the weak sisters, the weak roads, and the so-called short-line carriers. By doing this they can be given a greater share in traffic; hence they have a greater share of earnings and certainly—and this is more in point—get a larger share of equipment. The one thing from which the short line suffers and always has suffered is because of the shortness of equipment. We believe that these provisions will in a large measure relieve the situation with regard to short-line carriers and will permit the consolidation of the short line and the trunk-line connections and in that way strengthen the transportation of the Nation.

After these three features have been eliminated from the pending bill, namely, the transportation board, and consolidation, merger, and pooling, and Federal incorporation, there is left one other feature that has characterized all these plans, and that is the creation of regional commissions or regional commissioners. The argument in behalf of these is based upon the necessity of relief to the commission, and the public was told that the creation of regions would expedite the hearings. We canvassed that situation with great completeness and heard all the witnesses who desired to express a view. The result was that we did not put in the bill any provision looking to the creation of regional commissions or regional commissioners. We proceeded in this course for the following among other reasons: We ascertained from the commissioners themselves that under the present practice it is not necessary, as urged by many, that the shippers or complainants are compelled to come to Washington in order to be heard, thus subjecting them to large expense. Under the existing practice the Interstate Commerce Commission sends to the field its attorney examiners, and they take the testimony on the ground and submit it for review to the commission or the appropriate division of the commission. All the testimony and recommendations made by the attorney examiners is submitted, so that the commission can act expeditiously upon the hearings presented before the attorney examiners, and this involves little expense. Moreover, an attorney examiner can be sent on a day's notice to any place in the United States and hold a hearing. But when you create a regional commission you have all the formalism of a board. You will have the necessary delays and do not have the mobility of your attorney examiner. And will it save delay? It will not. Your regional commission will have to have its hearing, and when it has finished the hearing and completed its findings you could not deny to the shipper the right of appeal from your regional commission or your regional commissioner. Then, where have you gained anything in point of time? You have not, for you have injected another cause of delay, another obstruction in the pathway to a final decision. So the committee eliminated from the bill the creation of regional commissioners or regional commissions.

There are no ways by which you can circumscribe the jurisdiction of your regional commission as you can circumscribe the jurisdiction of your district courts by a limitation of, say, $3,000. You can not do that in your regional commission dealing with rates, fares, and charges. It is not the amount involved before such regional commission which determines the jurisdiction. The amount may be infinitesimal, but a few dollars, though the principle involved in a rate case may be as far-reaching as the Nation itself. So I say, we have concluded that we could not limit the jurisdiction of the proposed regional commissioners or commissions, and if this could not be done, and there was nothing to be gained by letting them have jurisdiction, but there was likelihood of more delay, we have not put them in the bill. They, too, are eliminated. We permit the jurisdiction to remain in the commission, where it always has existed, as well as the existing practices, but we have increased the membership of the commission by two, making it a commission now of 11 instead of 9 members. As to that, I will make reference a little later on.

But another and very serious objection which the committee found against regional commissions lay in the fact that in that way you could not secure uniformity of decision in rate making, for each regional commission might fix a different rate and build upon the rate a different rate structure. That would not be in the interest of business. Business, gentlemen, depends upon stability as much as upon the amount of the rate. If you have a dozen or more of these regional commissions scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land taking up rate matters and deciding them, each individually and without coordination one with the other, you would soon throw into the discard your entire rate structure. You might destroy the relationship of rates by so doing. Lack of uniformity is another cogent argument that persuaded us in eliminating the regional commissions, and, in that connection, I believe there was little or no dissent.

Another feature that characterizes the several plans is based on the idea of a guaranty. That is not a new notion. It has been adopted by many nations in times past, and it exists in some of them to-day. There are two forms of guaranty. There is what may be called a straight guaranty, where the Government guarantees to the owner of the railroad property a certain fixed rate of return. That form of guaranty has been used in New Zealand, in Australia, and in the countries of Europe—in Belgium, in France, and in Italy, and in other countries—with the inevitable result that a guaranty by government of a fixed return upon capitalization leads to extravagance, leads to waste, and inevitably leads to government ownership. We did not believe that Congress was willing to adopt a policy that had that trend.

But there is another form of guaranty that is more appealing and, on the face, less objectionable. It is the form that may be found in the so-called Warfield plan, and in the Senate plan, and in the transportation conference plan. What is it? The transportation board is to divide the country into certain regions or groups for rate-making purposes, and the roads in such groups or regions are to be valued, and they are to receive a certain fixed rate of return upon the averaged capitalization or valuation of all the carriers within the region or group. In the case of the Warfield plan it is a percentage upon the property investment account or the book cost. In the Senate plan it is to be based upon valuation when the valuation board finally determines valuation. When the transportation board or other agency has divided the country into regions and estimated the value of the railroads within the region and Congress has fixed the rate of return, say 6 per cent, then the transportation board says to the commission, "You have got to raise the level of rates in this region to such a point as will develop revenues enough to pay the 6 per cent minimum." That is the form of guaranty now being suggested for consideration by one branch of Congress. It is a form of guaranty, notwithstanding the fact that its proponents deny it is a guaranty, because the Government is not liable to suffer loss. True, the Government will not suffer loss, but it is a guaranty just the same, because your stockholder, your bondholder, says, "Why, I am all right; I am all secured, because the Government has got to fix such a level of rates as to produce such a rate per cent." It is certainly in essence a guaranty and we can not camouflage the fact.

We of the committee have not believed that any form of guaranty was wise or would be a safe, conservative plan for the solution of this most difficult problem. We believe that the rate-making power should remain where it now rests. I know through propaganda, very active in the last few years, it has been charged that the Interstate Commerce Commission has starved the railroads, destroyed their credit, and that now we have got to so adjust the whole law as to take from the commission the power to starve the railroads. Gentlemen, I have printed as a part of the report a statement made by Commissioner McChord showing the average dividend rate declared upon divided yielding stock for all the years from 1892 down to and including 1917, when Federal control began, was 6.19, a return that was higher than the return on municipal bonds in the great cities of the United States and a return higher than municipal or Government bonds in Great Britain and other nations of Europe.

The commission did not destroy the credit of the railroads. In my humble judgment, if there is any destruction of credit it is very largely due to the railroads themselves. For years they have proclaimed from the housetops that they had no credit, that they were on the verge of bankruptcy, and they used those arguments before the commission and before the State commissions by way of appeal to get an increase of rates. Do you think a banker could survive long if he got out on the street corner in front of his bank and said to the passersby, "My credit is gone; I am on the verge of bankruptcy"? There would be a run started on his bank within an hour. But that is not all. The credit of the carriers has been shaken by the action of some of the carriers and, as in all other things human, the innocent majority are compelled to suffer because of the guilty minority. I do not want to rehearse the awful financial stories that were brought out by the Interstate Commerce Commission's investigation of the Frisco and the Rock Island.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has consumed one hour. He is recognized for an additional hour.

Mr. ESCH. I need not relate the story of the Frisco, of the Rock Island, of the Chicago, Hamilton & Dayton, of the Pere Marquette, of the Pittsburgh Terminal, of the New Haven, or of the Chicago & Alton, and that whole long array. Financial wrecking was what largely drove the average investor from investing his earnings in the carriers, and it seems that the carriers have got a large responsibility on their shoulders in striving to restore the confidence of the investing public in their securities. I am sorry that it is so. The carrier is entitled to a fair return. I am willing to go as far as we possibly can in the present crisis to restore their credit and to put them on their feet so that they may again walk alone. But the facts can not be wholly forgotten, much less ignored.

Now, with reference to this matter of guaranty, it seems to me that it would be impossible for the commission or any regulatory body to maintain the level of rates in a region at such a point as would develop the rate per cent on a fair return. Rates fluctuate violently; they fluctuate from year to year; they fluctuate within the year. A drought over one of these regions may entirely change the operating revenues of that region, or a pest may destroy crops over a great area.

A flood that destroys railway property and bridges for a time will also have a serious effect upon the revenues of a railroad in that region. Fluctuations are bound to occur within the year; and yet under this rule of rate making the commission would have to maintain the level, and to do that it would have to shift that rate level from time to time, and this shifting of the rate level from time to time would beget uncertainty, and uncertainty, as I have already said, is detrimental to the business world. It unsettles business. It renders a contractor or a producer or a manufacturer unable to determine what price he shall charge three or six months in the future. We believe that that is also a difficulty which will be entailed if we establish the guaranty plan, as suggested in some of these bills.

Then this form of guaranty also provides as a sort of encouragement to the railroads and in order to preserve their morale a division of the excess over a fair return. That is a seductive proposition, as it has some merit; but we did not believe that Congress had any right constitutionally as a matter of law to say to a railroad company that was earning more than its fair retura under rates fixed by law and through the commission: "You must surrender a half or some other portion of that excess of earnings to your Government or to your employees or to somebody else." Being the output and the result of rates that were legal, fixed by a legal tribunal, has Congress the right to say that any portion of such excess shall not belong to the road that earned it, but that it can be taken away by the Government and preserved or kept by the Government or given to any other body? We have not felt that we would go to such an extent, and so we have not adopted that plan.

But, gentlemen, in my opinion, in studying the history of other nations which have adopted this division of excess earnings plan, there is no likelihood that there will be any excess any more than there was likelihood of there being any core to the apple in the case of the gamin. Other nations have tried this plan of dividing excess earnings. I think the State of New Hampshire had a law of that kind years ago, but it repealed the law, and it repealed it because it never got any excess earnings. The railroads saw to it that through their expenditures there would not be any excess. They tried it in the Republic of Brazil, and they are not getting any excess. Judge WATSON, of our committee, cited an instance with reference to one of the railroads in Brazil as showing what little likelihood there was of any railroad under such a plan developing any surplus. He stated that one of the railroads down there had two presidents.

One president would hold office for six months and then spend six months in Europe investigating the financial standing and operation of roads in Europe.

The other president of course would be holding down the job in Brazil, and when the first president returned then the second president went to Europe to investigate the financial operations of the railroads of Europe. There will not be any surplus under that plan. And so, gentlemen of the committee, we have not put it into the bill that is now before you.

I think that under the plan we have adopted we are able to take care in a large measure of the so-called short lines, and the provisions of the bill relating to them will be pointed out as they are reached.

There is another reason why our committee was persuaded not to establish this surplus-earning plan, this guaranty plan, based upon a certain level of rates, and that reason was based upon political grounds. Suppose, gentlemen, this year a law were in force whereby Congress said that 6 per cent was to be a fair return upon your capitalization or your book cost and that under it, on the level of rates the commission created in response to the mandate of the transportation board, the earnings were large. What would happen? What might happen? A political agitation throughout the United States; a political party might take up the shibboleth; a plank might be inserted in a platform to this effect: "Whereas the returns to the railroads during the year 19— having been so much, therefore resolved, that we favor an amendment to the law fixing the rate not 6 but 5 per cent." What would then happen? Immediately it would become a football of politics, and parties might vie with one another in appealing to the public by declaring, "Put us in and we will reduce the rate of a fair return to 5 per cent; the law fixes it now at 6."

I do not believe that it is wise for us to adopt any plan that will subject the rate-making powers of the commission, or that will subject the rate structure itself, with all its complications and complexities, to the whim of any political party.

I wish to take up briefly the pending bill and point out the more salient features contained therein. But to start with I wish to say that we did not incorporate in the bill new and strange features and untried plans. We thought it wiser to build upon a foundation already in existence and which we believed to have been well laid. We did not think that this was a good time for experimentation, a time when the world is in ferment and men's minds and thoughts are not crystallized. We thought this, above all times, should be the time when we should act conservatively and proceed step by step as experience leads the way. We might by the adoption of some experiments make the remedy worse than the disease.

So we stated in this bill that we would follow the interstate commerce act as existing, with certain amendments to meet existing and future conditions.

We also in the bill sought to retain whatever of advantages inured from Federal control. I have already enumerated some of these arising out of consolidations and mergers and pooling. But there are other advantages which the country concedes have been due to the consolidation of all our systems into one, and among these other advantages is the matter of the joint use of terminals. I will explain that a little further on. The joint use of terminals, with the proper compensation to the owner thereof, and operated under rules and regulations prescribed by the commission, will inure to the great advantage of the shipping and traveling public. The day has arrived when terminal property in the big and congested cities of the United States has reached a prohibitive level of value, so that if we are to continue to meet the increasing demands of traffic and we can not get new terminals, we must make a greater use of the terminals we now have, and we can do this most easily and most cheaply by requiring the joint use of such terminals.

Then there are other advantages in connection with Federal control that are patent to us all and that we seek to continue, and some of these arise in connection with the cooperation of rail and water traffic, but we will consider these matters later.

I want to call attention to an omission from this bill compared with H. R. 4378 as originally introduced. That bill covered the telegraph and telephone companies. This bill eliminates them. This does not mean that telegraph and telephone companies are not to remain common carriers. We do not change that, for they are common carriers. They are subject to the law and have to make rates that are reasonable and just and nondiscriminatory, and if they do not do that they are subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the commission can determine what just and reasonable rates shall be charged. The telegraph and telephone companies must still file their reports annually with the commission on forms prescribed. Aside from that this bill does not give the commission further power over these wire systems.

Why did we eliminate them from the provisions of the bill? For this reason: There are 11,000 or 12,000 telephone companies in the United States. Most of these are small, independent lines with small capitalization, confined practically to counties or municipalities. If we had kept them under this bill, they would have been subject to the provision requiring these small companies to get a certificate of convenience and necessity if they wanted to make an extension of a line or to abandon a line no matter whether long or short. If they had been kept under the bill, they would have had to come here and get certificates as to the issuance of stocks and bonds.

We did not believe that we should subject these thousands of small companies to these harassments, in view of the fact that so doing would give to the public little or no advantage and would entail upon them enormous expense.

As there are only two considerable telegraph companies, the Western Union and the Postal, and as these two companies, as to their rates, are now under the jurisdiction of the commission, we also believed that it was unnecessary to incorporate them in the bill. So they are subjected to just as much control as they were before. We have eliminated them for these several reasons.

We also thought, as to telegraph and telephone or wire systems, that it would be better not to complicate a bill directed to railroads with provisions relating to the wire systems, and it was our thought that later, after fuller discussion and investigation, a bill could be reported that would deal wholly with the wire systems, and for that reason, among the others which I have given, we have eliminated them.

The original bill also puts water transportation under the provisions of this bill. That is to say, the commission was given power to regulate port-to-port traffic in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes and between the coasts and Alaska. This bill eliminates port-to-port traffic and does not give the commission power over water transportation. The majority of the committee thought best to eliminate all reference to water transportation. Personally, I believe that the time will come when there must be regulation of water lines if there is to be coordination of rail and water transportation. I for myself can not conceive how we can coordinate rail and water transportation and regulate only the rail carriers. If that can be done without law, I will yield my position; but I can not see how you can do it and say to water carriers: "You go scot free, do anything you want to, but as to the rail carriers we will regulate you to the limit."

We have, however, retained in this bill sufficient jurisdiction to continue the operation of the Government tows and barges that were placed, under the order of Director General McAdoo, on the Mississippi and the Black Warrior Rivers, and that are being placed upon the upper Mississippi and upon the Erie Barge Canal. It is evident that immediately upon the termination of Federal control the control of these tows and barges on inland waters would likewise cease; and, in view of the fact that the Government has already got an investment of something like $10,000,000 and is committed to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 more, the committee felt bound to provide some legislation here that would declare the status of these Government tows and barges operated upon these inland waters. So the bill does provide that the operation of these tows and barges on the Black Warrior and Mississippi Rivers and on the barge canal shall be put in the hands of the War Department and operated through the Chief of Engineers.

Now, there may be some opposition to this plan. There may be some who would prefer that it should be given to the United States Shipping Board, because its duties are more akin to that line of work. But the Shipping Board act specifically eliminates inland-water transportation from its operations. It does include commerce on the Great Lakes, but not transportation upon the rivers and canals of the United States. So when we put the jurisdiction of these Government tows and barges on these rivers and canals in the hands of the War Department, we are taking nothing away from the Shipping Board.

It has been suggested that there might be some other governmental agency that might operate these tows and barges, but in the opinion of the committee no other agency is so well adapted, so well equipped, and has had so much experience in their operation upon the inland rivers and canals as the Corps of Engineers of the War Department; but as to the rates, fares, and charges we retain regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission and we hope that this plan may work out successfully and that we may restore traffic upon the rivers and inland waters of the United States, for the time is coming when we must utilize every transportation agency—rail, highway, and water.

With reference to the framework of the bill, you will notice that we have changed somewhat the ordinary procedure in that we have established titles and used 100 as the basis for each title, so that the number of a section immediately discloses the title in which it is to be found. Then, there are numerous provisions in the bill for the numbering of the paragraphs in the interstate-commerce act. They are not numbered now, and if you wish to amend a paragraph of the commerce act you must now say the sixth or the eighth or the tenth paragraph of section so-and-so of the act. In this bill we number the paragraphs so that hereafter every paragraph will have its number and can be cited by that number. The establishment of titles and the numbering of the paragraphs in the sections of the commerce act are for the purpose of brevity and clarity.

Title 1 of the bill contains practically nothing more than definitions. These definitions aid in the understanding of the bill.

Title 2 relates to the ending of Federal control, and you will notice that the title and that provision relating to the ending of Federal control are given in more or less detail. We have segregated out of the Federal control act all those grants of power which we desire to have the President relinquish when Federal control ceases and leave to him the exercise of those powers, contained practically in section 1 of the act, which he must continue to exercise for the final adjudication and settlement of all accounts between the several carriers and the Railroad Administration.

We have a provision under title 2 as to the continuing of existing rates, fares, charges, practices, regulations, and so forth, and existing differentials of rates and joint rates and aggregate of rates. It is apparent that unless we put in a provision of this kind, then as soon as the Federal control ended all the rates made under Federal control would cease and the rates would revert to their percontrol status—both interstate and intrastate. It is clear to all that that would be calamitous. If the rates of the railroads now existing as fixed by the director general should suddenly be brought to a precontrol level there would scarcely be a railroad in the United States that could begin to pay operating expenses.

What do we do? We say that all the rates, fares, and charges and differentials of rates and joint rates and aggregates of the rates existing during Federal control and at the time Federal control ceases shall continue in full force and effect until they are changed by authority of law, which would mean until they were changed by the proper regulatory body.

Under that section of the bill we feel that we have taken care of a very grave emergency. A United States district judge in Baker City, Oreg., several months ago decided that intrastate rates when Federal control ceases would immmediately revert to the same status as prior to Federal control. That decision has not been finally determined. I do not know what the outcome of it will be.

But there is no doubt as to the interstate rates—every one would revert to the precontrol status the day that Federal control ended. Imagine! These rates were increased 25 per cent by order No. 28 of June, last year, as to freight and 50 per cent as to passenger fares. That increased level of rates is in force to-day. If control ceases without this section in the bill the rates would be dropped 25 per cent on freight and 50 per cent on passengers, with the consequences I have already related.

Title 2 also contains a provision as to refunding. It is obvious that the Government under the Federal control act in its dealings with corporate property, capitalized approximately at $18,000,000,000 with a gross income annually of over four and one-half billion dollars, would have a vast amount of bookkeeping and would have many open accounts that would require adjustment. We therefore provide under title 2 the manner of funding the indebtedness of the carriers to the Federal Government, allowing the Government under the Federal control act and in accordance with the standard contract to offset, exclusive of certain reductions under the contract, the indebtedness of the Government to the carrier.

This matter of funding will be given more detailed consideration under the five-minute rule. Suffice it to say we permit the carrier at its option to extend the period of payment to the Government over 10 years, in annual installments, or with the right of paying the debt before the 10 years have elapsed, with a certain rate of interest agreed upon. There shall, however, be taken a first-mortgage security for this funded debt. If there is any other indebtedness it is to be represented by demand notes with whatever practical security the carrier may be able to give to the satisfaction of the President of the United States.

There is also contained in title 2 a provision as to guaranty. The guaranty provided in this bill is practically the standard return of the test period provided for in the Federal control act, but we try to differentiate the guaranty of six months provided for in the bill in order that it may be fair to the Government. Under the standard return or rental or compensation provided for in the Federal control act—I do not care what term you use, as they are used interchangeably—the Government pays the railroads under Federal control annually the average railway operating income for the three years which ended on the 30th of June, 1917. That will total for all Class I, II, and III roads approximately $963,000,000. The income by months is something like $76,000,000. This income, as you all know, does not amount to $76,000,000 every month, for the business of a railroad is seasonal, and the first six months of the year are, as a rule, the lean months, and the roads earn in the first six months only about 43 per cent of the total earnings of the entire year.

We therefore say, to be fair, that the six months guaranty period provided for in our bill, no matter when it occurs in the 12-month period of the year, shall be based upon the average during the test period for the same set of six months, so that the Government would not be mulcted, for instance, in paying a higher standard return than that to be paid when based upon the return on the months over which the guaranty provided in this bill extends. I believe this is a matter of fair dealing, which will commend itself to the membership of the House. This guaranty is fortified. I know it may be said that it is unsafe to guarantee the roads for six months after the Government has relinquished control. It might be so unless we carefully safeguard the situation, and we do this, because we say that the railroads should not be permitted to expend for maintenance of way and equipment and for operating costs more than the average for the corresponding months of the three years of the test period. We further protect the Government by saying that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall pass upon these expenditures for maintenance of way and equipment and operating expenses, and if there is an excess, or if the commission fears there may be an excess, an unwarranted excess, the commission is given power to demand a restatement of those expenses.

This bill holds the railroads to the level of expenditures during the test period, allowing a certain amount of discretion in the commission for increased costs of labor and materials during the guaranty period.

In another respect we fortified the Government by saying that no carrier shall get this guaranty unless within 60 days after Federal control ceases it shall apply for increases or changes in the rates. We do this because if we did not do it the carrier would simply lean back and say: "Why, we do not have to worry about increasing the rates, we are getting our standard return, we will take what the Government gives us, and then we will file an application for an increase just prior to the expiration of the six months." We provide in the bill that the carrier will have to make the application within 60 days after Federal control ceases, so that the burden of this will fall not upon the Government, as has been the case during Federal control, but upon the shipping public of the United States, where under private control and operation it should and ought to be. We believe we have so framed that section that the Treasury of the Government will not be endangered.

Realizing the financial straits of many of these roads, especially of the weak roads and some of the short-line roads, due to a shortage of cash, we allow them to borrow from the United States Government at a 6 per cent rate per annum, a rate that no doubt for these weak roads and perhaps some of the strong roads would be less than the average market rate which they otherwise would have to pay. We believe that this is necessary in order to maintain the financial status of many of the so-called weaker lines and in order to enable them to function properly and not bring on any large number of receiverships.

We allow these loans to stand for a period of five years, but we provide that they must be applied for within two years after Federal control ceases. We have extended the time to two years within which to make the application instead of one year, as we originally had it, upon the suggestion made to us that if we extend the period to two years many of these roads will be able to get along with the income they get from the rates and would not apply for relief at all if they had two years, whereas if we restricted the period of application to only one year all of them would feel as a matter of safety and as an assurance against hazard that they would have to apply within the first year.

We also create a revolving fund of $250,000,000 to take care of these loans. This figure was arrived at after conference with the Hon. Swagar Sherley, director of finance of the United States Railway Administration. He stated that the maturities for 1920 will amount to approximately $225,000,000, and that the railroads might need for additions and betterments and extensions during 1920 possibly $750,000,000, which is more than the Government expended for this purpose during the two years of Federal control, and is somewhat more than the railroads themselves expended during the test period ending 1917. That would make practically a billion dollars. Mr. Sherley's idea was—and the committee agreed with him—that if the roads borrowed to the limit of $250,000,000, the banks, knowing that this was a 6 per cent proposition, would themselves be glad to loan the money, and therefore there might not be any demand upon the Federal Government for loans in excess of the amount of the revolving fund. I believe that his opinion in that matter will be justified.

I pass now to another feature of the bill, title 3, which deals with the labor proposition. Of course, we anticipate that this title will give rise to considerable discussion and offers of amendment. Your committee is not dogmatic. It does not herald a panacea for labor ills. It does not claim that it has found the absolute solution and that hereafter all will be peace and harmony. Not at all. Title 3 gave us as much concern and we devoted as much time to it as any other title in the bill, and it has given much concern to others who have investigated the subject matter. A labor conference was called here some time ago by the President. That conference labored for two or three weeks and finally threw up its hands and confessed that it had no solution to offer. Your committee, with all of the other problems that were thrust upon it in connection with the railroad problem, had this matter thrust upon it also, and it has presented to you this plan.

Our theory is that primarily, fundamentally, we must create such a tribunal for the ascertainment of facts and the decision of questions relating to wages and hours of service and working conditions as will commend it to the judgment of mankind. [Applause.] Unless we can do that there will be doubt as to the validity and the justice of the award and there will be those who will want to break from such an award. If we can create a tribunal so fair, so honest, so honorable that neither party to the controversy can cast aspersions upon it, have we not gone a long way toward begetting respect for the award of that tribunal not merely on the part of the parties interested in the dispute but on the part of the general public? It was this that inspired us to draft title 3 and to provide the machinery therein contained. I know some of you may say it is complicated, but you can not devise any system that will cover the situation carefully that will not be complicated. We had more than one plan presented to us which on final analysis had to be abandoned.

We have given you this plan and its fundamental thought is to create a panel, just as under the judicature of America and Great Britain we create a panel out of which we can draw the necessary men to decide any given dispute. On your panel you should place men who represent the various interests that may be effected by any controversy. We create the two great groups—the employer group and the employee group. They constitute the panel, and when a dispute arises between a union and the railroad and it is brought to the attention of this panel, which we call the railroad adjustment board, that board immediately draws from its own body the representatives of the employer group and an equal number of representatives of the employee group to constitute a nisi prius court as it were to try the dispute. In this we have retained the plan that is back of these adjustment boards that have been operating under Federal control. Why should these conference committees, taken from the panel, be equally divided as to the contending interests? They are to be equally divided in order to force an adjustment without seeking to go to an appeal board. This has worked pretty well with the existing adjustment boards, and we hope it will work well if this plan becomes a part of the final enactment.

From this conference committee, created out of the panel to decide nisi prius cases by hearing or trial, there shall be an appeal to an appeal board consisting of nine members, three of whom shall be appointed by the President out of sets proposed or suggested by the employer members of the panel, three are to be selected by the President out of sets recommended by the employee members of the panel, and three are to be appointed by the President as representing the public at large—one representing the industrial interests, another the agricultural interests, and the third unorganized labor. This appeal board makes the final award. That final award becomes impressed upon the contract between the employer and the employee. It is made a part, therefore, of a legal contract. Gentlemen, to my mind one of the grave situations connected with the labor problem to-day is the violation of contracts. Unless contracts can be lived up to, both by the employer and the employee, no system of award or arbitration or mediation or conciliation will avail much, if anything. We believe that the railroads should stick to the letter of the contract it makes with its employees, in union or brotherhood, and, per contra, we believe that labor in contracting through its representatives should also live up to its contract. [Applause.] The difficulty comes in the enforcement, a difficulty which is acknowledged by all. We seek to provide such enforcement in the pending bill by giving the right of action against a union or an organization, in case a member violates the contract, with right of damage against common property of such union or organization, except such common property as is represented by insurance, fraternal or other benefits, which all these organizations maintain. That is, in brief, what we have suggested.

We have not gone to the limit of putting in an antistrike clause. I know that this House is possibly swayed by the situation as it exists on the outside at this particular moment, and it seems that labor is not in such high standing as it was a few months ago; but it is not wise always to judge the future by a present emergency condition. I do not know what the future has in store. My own thought is that if we put in a provision here penalizing a strike that the only way we could reach the matter would be to penalize everybody who struck. Strikes are threatened which involve not merely hundreds of men, as strikes used to in an early day, but strikes are now pending that involve millions. Gentlemen, not as a matter of sentiment; not, if you please, as a matter of so-called justice; but as a matter of workability, how are we to enforce a law penalizing strikes when the strike may involve several hundreds of thousands of men? My fear is that if men are permitted to disregard a law and see that it is not to be enforced, they will be inclined to disregard other laws.

There are other features of this bill to which I desire to call attention briefly. We have amended the interstate commerce act in sundry and diverse particulars. I can only call attention to the most salient features, and they are the following: In section 400 we deal with a division of rates. Now, division of rates is a fundamental proposition in regard to the revenues of any carrier, whether it be a short or a trunk line. A short-line carrier can not live unless it gets a just proportion of the rate. We give in this bill to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to determine the division of rates. Under the law as it exists the commission's power can only be invoked where there was a dispute as to the division of rates between the carriers. We provide now that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right on its own initiative without complaint to determine a division of rates. In practice under the old law a short-line carrier did not want to complain because as a rule it was largely securing its revenue by sufferance of a trunk-line connection, so it endured the ills that it had and took the short end of a division of the rates. We wanted to liberalize this situation, and we think we have in the bill, by giving the commission the power to act on its own initiative. We believe this power in the commission will result in great good to the short-line roads, which have been so insistent in asking for relief at the hands of the committee.

Then we have in title 2, practically in this same section, a very material amendment of the car-service act. The car-service act was passed about May, 1917, just too soon to become fully operative before Federal control began, so that the act has never had a fair chance of demonstrating its efficacy in the matter of car service. In the form in which we passed the act some two years ago it related only to the exchange, interchange, and return of cars. We have enlarged that jurisdiction by saying that now the authority of the commission shall include the use—note the force of every word:

The term "car service" in this act shall include the use, control, supply, movement, distribution, exchange, interchange, and return of locomotives—

That was not in the old act—

cars, and other vehicles—

Which was not in the original act—

used in the transportation of property.

Further, it gives the commission power as to the supply, movement, and operation of trains by any carrier by railroad subject to this act. If that authority had rested in the commission prior to Federal control, it might not have been necessary to have given to the President the great powers we gave him by the Federal control act. One of the commissioners stated that if the car-service act as now proposed to be amended had been in force prior to 1917, we might not have had to enact the Federal control act at all. This section relates to the use, control, and supply of cars and to the control and movement of trains. Under it the commission will have the right to order a carrier to supply itself with cars.

In a decision of the Supreme Court, known as the Tank-Car case (United States v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 242 U. S., 208), decided, I think, three years ago, it was held that the commission in ordering the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to supply itself with tank cars did not have such authority. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] if that is not right?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was the tank-car case.

Mr. ESCH. Yes. This section would give the commission power to order the carrier to supply itself with cars.

I hope, gentlemen, that these provisions, which seem so insignificant upon first reading, may be studied and weighed. When they are, I think you will begin to realize to what extent we have enlarged the scope and power of the Federal authority in the great matter of transportation.

We also took into consideration the matter of coal supply and of coal cars and the distribution of coal cars. There are gentlemen on this floor who represent coal-supplying districts and they know the difficulties mine operators have had in years past with reference to the allotment of cars to the mines based upon output. We seek in this section 2 to give the commission power over the distribution of coal cars and to avoid the evil of the so-called "assigned" cars. We are putting in the law what the Interstate Commerce Commission has already decided to be the proper practice and what the Supreme Court has confirmed to be the proper practice.

We also give the commission greater power in cases of emergency. You know we have had an emergent condition throughout the country many times in recent years. We want the commission to have the power to act promptly on the spur of the moment in case of emergency in order to prevent congestion at terminals; in order to route traffic around a congested terminal so that it may reach its destination at the earliest possible date; in order to ship goods over the most direct route regardless of instructions contained in the bills of lading. We want all this power to be exercised by the commission in an emergency. The bill gives such powers to the commission. You know how the ports in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia were cluttered up with a vast congestion of freight during the summer of 1918 before the armistice was signed, and you remember how embargoes had to be issued way back to the interior where the commerce originated. This bill gives the commission the right of levying embargoes to prevent the goods moving to the port terminals and thus congest not only the port terminals but the sidings and tracks for a hundred miles from the harbor city. We give the commission the right to issue permits for shipments for similar reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. The additional hour of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Very well.

We also give the commission the right of treating each emergency as it arises and of also distributing cars and locomotives in order to meet such emergency. With these powers granted and duly exercised we think many of the evils from which the country has suffered in years past may in a large degree be eliminated.

In section 402 we treat of extensions and abandonments. We believe one main cause of the so-called "weak sister" has been the unrestricted right of railroads to be built wherever their projectors thought fit. As a result of this unrestricted right we find in all States of the Union cases where, after a road has been built and long maintained and has gotten its traffic well established, another road puts in a parallel line with the usual result that instead of having one strong road doing the traffic we have two weak roads, as they have to charge the same rate between competitive points, and we burden the public by compelling it to sustain two weak roads when one strong road would have been sufficient.

How does this bill stop that? In this way: Before a road or an extension thereof can be built it must get what is called in this bill a certificate of convenience or necessity from the commission as a condition precedent to the building of a single rod of the extension or of the new line. That means that the commission must first investigate the situation. It must first consult the communities that would be connected or would be located on the proposed line. It must consult the shipping interests and producing interests and all other interests that might be involved and then determine whether or not it should issue a certificate of convenience and necessity.

This is not new law. Several of the States have this same kind of law now, notably the State of New York and the State of Wisconsin and other States, and the law has worked successfully. It has prevented the construction of new lines that could not by any possibility have any hope of meeting operating expenses, not to say anything about profits. It would prevent the construction of some of these short lines which may have no hope of ultimate financial success. In every way we have felt that this provision would lessen the number of "weak sisters," would prevent the creation of any new ones, and would strengthen the existing lines. We can get better service by strengthening the existing line than by creating a rival or parallel line which would diminish the ability of the first line to make further improvements and betterments. We have also provided for abandonments.

Railroads sometimes desire to surrender the rights granted by their charter. The traffic is not what they expected, business conditions change, the natural resources they thought first to get out to the open market become depleted or become exhausted. There is no power now to restrain abandonment under Federal law. Railroads in many States can do as they will. We provide that there shall be some Federal control over the matter of abandonment, so that cities and villages that have been built up on these lines can be given due consideration by the regulatory body before the order for abandonment is issued. We give such control to the commission to investigate the situation and determine the facts. But neither provision, the building of new lines or the abandonment of old ones, affects spurs or switches or terminal tracks or interurban lines wholly within a State. These we leave to State control, where they already belong.

The section in this title as to terminals I have already discussed sufficiently. I therefore will not dwell longer on that, only to say that we give the commission the right of determining the just compensation for the use of these terminals. You can understand why a railroad which has an advantageous location and has extensive terminals desires to retain the exclusive advantage of its own foresight and expenditure. That is natural. But the public interest is a larger interest than that of any corporation so we provide in this bill that the commission shall have the right of ordering the joint use of terminals under certain conditions, providing for terms of adjustment and compensation.

There is another provision contained in Title IV, relating to consolidation and pooling, which I have already sufficiently discussed. It is found in section 407.

We amend the Panama Canal act in this bill and this amendment may be found in section 408. Under the original Panama Canal act, as you know, all railroads that had water lines were compelled to divorce the ownership between the rail line and the water line where use was made of the Panama Canal, the thought being that this divorcement was necessary so that a railroad should not be competing with itself. But that evil that we sought to remedy in the Panama Canal act became applicable to all of the United States, and so as a result of the Panama Canal act, primarily designed to cause a divorcement of ownership between rail lines and water lines using the Panama Canal, it has been made applicable to like conditions all over the United States, in consequence of which certain railroad lines operating in Maryland, for instance, had to sever their ownership in boat lines operating from port to port along the eastern shore of Chesapeake Bay, and, likewise, vessels owned by rail carriers operating in Long Island Sound were compelled to divorce the ownership, although those vessel lines were a great convenience to the public. For a like reason the rail carriers like the Erie, the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, the Lehigh, and the Delaware & Lackawanna, which own vessel lines operating on the Great Lakes extending beyond Erie and Buffalo, had to divorce ownership there, so that to-day there are only two vessels operating on the Great Lakes owned by a rail carrier, and those two are owned by the Lackawanna road.

What has been the result? Cities on Lake Michigan and the head of the Lakes have been injured by reason of this enforcement of the Panama Canal act, which necessitated this separation of joint rail and vessel ownership. We, in this bill, declare that the rail carrier can restore its ship lines or vessels, and that there can be new shipping under the provisions of this section, so that there may be again restored upon the Great Lakes that splendid traffic service which existed there for years and which is now practically ended. We feel that we have done something of a constructive kind by the insertion of this provision in the pending bill.

Section 411 contains matter relating to docks and rails. The original Panama Canal act authorized the physical connection of the rails of the carrier with the dock. This bill gives the commission the further power to order such physical connection between rail and dock. It also gives the commission authority to order the construction of a dock, the payment therefor to be made either by the water carrier or the rail carrier, or by both, and it is provided that such dock, when completed, shall be considered as a terminal and be subject to all the rules and regulations of terminals. We believe that unless we can have a physical connection between rail and water carriage we can not coordinate the service, and can not, therefore, promote a water traffic that will endure. If we can get the two connected in this way, and then authorize the commission to establish joint rates and through routes, with joint bills of lading, we have gone a great way to reestablish water transportation upon the rivers and canals of the United States. I certainly hope that this provision of the bill may commend itself to your favorable consideration.

We also have a provision giving the commission the right to fix minimum as well as maximum rates, and minimum and maximum joint rates, and minimum and maximum proportional rates, and, in fact, the absolute rate itself. We give it all that power. There is an advantage in giving the commission authority to fix a minimum rate. The commission has never heretofore had that power since the original act was adopted in 1887. We give it the right of fixing the minimum rate in order that it may meet some of the problems arising out of the long-and-short-haul clause as contained in the fourth section. We give it the right of fixing a minimum rate in order that it may protect a water carrier against the destructive competition of a rail carrier. You know the story—you can read it upon every mile of every inland waterway of the United States—how the water carrier started, and then the rail carrier paralleled the river bank and made a rate so low that the water carrier had to abandon its line and its route, and after such abandonment the rail carrier raised the rate and the public was no better off and was, in fact, worse off than before. If the commission fixes the minimum rate, it can say to the rail carrier: "Thus far you can go, but no farther." The water carrier must be permitted to live. To do this we must provide for the minimum rate.

We also provide for the enactment into law of what is popularly known as the decision of the Supreme Court in the Shreveport case. Where intrastate rates constitute an undue burden, advantage, preference, or prejudice against interstate rates, such rates are declared to be unlawful. We have incorporated into law the decision of the court. When by reason of the low level of the intrastate rates an undue burden is cast upon the interstate traffic the citizens and the shippers of other States are compelled to pay higher interstate freight rates than they would have had to pay had that State enacted or put into force and effect proper intrastate rates. We give this power of determination to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but in order that the State commissions may have a proper hearing we provide that the State commissions may, to use a phrase of the street, "sit in" with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It can sit with the Interstate Commerce Commission; it can hear the testimony, and can present its full case through its legally constituted authority. It can present the full case, but the final adjudication is to rest with the Interstate Commerce Commission and not with the State regulatory body. We believe that this getting together of the interstate and State regulatory bodies will lessen the number of Shreveport cases, better the feeling between the interstate and the State commissions, and promote the commercial interests of the country.

In section 417 we provide a rule for rate making. There is a difference of opinion as to the necessity of putting a rule of rate making into this legislation. The committee deemed it wise to insert such a provision to the end, I assume, that the Interstate Commerce Commission might have some authority in the law to point to in case their decisions and findings should be criticised. There is danger in a rule of rate making in this that unless we include all the elements that enter into the problem we do not meet that problem and we may provoke litigation. This is the danger in any rule of rate making. My idea is that if there is to be a rule of rate making the commission should be authorized to examine into the economy and efficiency in the operation of the carrier who seeks an increase of rates.

We also provide for a suspension of rates. Under existing law, where an application for an increase of rates or rate structures is made, not less than 30 days are allowed for such notice. The commission, under existing law, can suspend the rates so filed for a period of 4 months and then can extend that period of suspension for an additional six months, making a total of 10 months of suspension.

The committee believe that is too long a period. If the railroad is entitled to its increase, it ought not to be denied that increase for a period of 10 months, and if the shipper is entitled to a less amount he should get his relief more speedily. This bill provides that the period of suspension, instead of being a total of 10 months, shall be a total of 120 days. If the commission does not file its decision when those 120 days have expired, the increased rates will go into effect nevertheless, with right in the commission subsequently to change or alter them in the same manner, as though the period had not elapsed. Should the commission finally decide that the increased rates were unjustified or unreasonable, the carrier is ordered to reimburse the shipper for such excess with interest. We believe that this provision, advocated strongly by the commission, will appeal to you.

We also changed the existing law which requires fares, rates, and charges to remain in existence for a period of two years after the determination of the commission. We provide no limit, believing that it is wiser to have no fixed limit. Some of the Shreveport cases were pending for practically two years. It is easy to conceive of a case that might continue for almost two years, and if the present law remained in effect it would mean that the rates established after long and expensive litigation might become operative for a period much less than the two years.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I understand and approve thoroughly of the idea of the committee in reducing the time within which the rate might be suspended to 120 days instead of 10 months, but where an application is made by a shipper for a reduction of rates has the committee done anything whereby he can get relief in less than the former time?

Mr. ESCH. Any way that the shipper can get relief in case the rate should be less?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In less time than 10 months.

Mr. ESCH. I think that would be in the jurisdiction of the commission, anyhow, as I understand.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand it, a shipper may make application to the commission for a reduction of rates.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And that hangs it up indefinitely until the decision by the commission?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is there any way by which the time for relief to the shipper may be reduced as you have reduced it to the carrier?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think this section would meet just the situation the gentleman presents. If the gentleman can think of any amendment that would meet his particular view, I think we will be glad to entertain it.

I have only a few more things to say. Of these one is in regard to loss by diversion which is found in section 419. Diversion of traffic by one carrier from another seems to have been a favorite outdoor sport of very wide participation in recent years; especially has it been practiced against the so-called short-line carriers. By diversion of traffic I mean this: A shipper says in his bill of lading, "Send my freight routed by certain carriers via certain junction points to destination." But an intervening carrier diverts that shipment of freight contrary to the directions in the bill of lading to the loss of the first carrier or, as is often the case, to the loss of a short line. We say in this bill: "For such diversion of traffic we give you the right to sue for damages for the full amount of freight charges which you would have earned had the traffic not been diverted." The diversion of traffic is a matter from which the short line has suffered more than have the trunk lines and we think that by putting in this sort of penalty provision we may stop such diversions or at least lessen the practice.

I wish to say a word with reference to the divisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. As you know, by an act of Congress passed in 1917 we authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to do business by subdividing its members into divisions of three members, in order to expedite the business and in order that there might be no delay in the handing down of decisions, and that the full field of their activities might be more completely and expeditiously covered. We made one exception, however, in that the division of valuation, to make the valuation called for by the physical-valuation act, was made to consist of five members.

Since that act was passed, the committee believes that we can now safely reduce the size of the valuation division to three members and thus make it harmonious with other divisions now existing in the commission. Nothing will be lost, because decisions of the full commission on all principles of valuation under the valuation act will still be assured. Although the division of three will first make the investigation and file tentative findings, the full commission will pass upon the work of the division.

In section 437 we cover what is known as the stock and bond features of the bill. The House is familiar with this part of the bill, because on three prior occasions it has adopted almost this identical legislation: First, in 1910, when we had this provision attached to the Mann-Elkins Act of that year; again, in 1914, when the House passed the bill containing provisions now contained in this bill; again, in 1916, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] presented in a bill the same provisions we are now about to consider. His bill was reported favorably by the committee and passed by an overwhelming vote. All three of these efforts of the House failed in the Senate.

If our bill of 1914—and perhaps of 1910, but especially of 1914—had been enacted into law, in my opinion we would not have had the shameful financial record of the Frisco, the Rock Island, the Pere Marquette, and the New Haven, had we given the commission the power we seek to give it now. Hereafter, under this bill, there shall be no issue of stocks or bonds without a certification from the commission that they are necessary and needful in the public interest. [Applause.] It is a strange thing that a provision that was buffeted about, assailed, and denied even a hearing a few years ago should to-day be accepted and put into every plan that has been presented to Congress. We feel that you will indorse this provision of the bill.

Again, we increase the size of the commission, as I have stated, by 2 members, making 11 in all, and while this will not permit, for instance, an equal division into divisions in the first instance, still we are advised by the commission that they can take one member off of an existing division and add him to the two new members and create what will be known as the division of security issues. We provide that the stock and bond provisions shall not go into effect immediately upon the enactment of the bill, because some time will be required for the appointment of the two new members and for organization of the new division of securities and getting it into working order before applications shall be filed with it. We therefore allow a lapse of 120 days before the stock and bond sections become effective. Control of securities is going to be a large task. It is going to be a task of great responsibility. We will have to have men of the highest character and financial experience upon this division.

Under all the circumstances we have felt that members of the Interstate Commerce Commission were entitled to the small increase of salary which we grant, $2.000 per annum. Even then it will be no more than the salaries that are being paid to the members of the Federal Reserve Board, and the duties and responsibilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission are no less than are those of this board.

Again, we have put in a provision in the last section of the bill giving authority to the commission to install automatic train control or stop devices. We had considerable testimony before us to the effect that even railroads that are equipped with the best kind of automatic block signals have frequent collisions upon their lines because of a momentary inattention on the part of the engineer or the trainman or of the towerman or of the electrical operator. We believe that the time has come when the commission can well be given the power, after full investigation, to authorize the installation over any part or the whole of an existing line of an automatic train control device. We do not compel the use of any particular device; the commission can fix the conditions, limits, and specifications of such train control device and the carrier can make the selection and install a portion or a part or the whole of his line with such device under the supervision of the commission. The cost is not prohibitive, and such devices have passed beyond the experimental stage. We therefore feel that we can ask of this Congress that authority be granted to the commission to install such device upon the railroads of the United States.

Now, gentlemen, I have talked almost three hours. I have wearied myself and I have no doubt I have wearied you. I would be glad to yield to answer any questions, but I hope a full opportunity will be given under the five-minute rule. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before I begin the discussion I would like to ask how much time the gentleman from Wisconsin used.

The CHAIRMAN. Two hours and 32 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to take as little time as possible to-day, as I can not do the subject justice in the time I shall consume. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing some statistics and other matters that I do not want to take time to read. I did not put in a minority report, which I could have done, and in which I could have included these matters. Therefore, I make this request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in beginning my statement, I want to give the reasons why I have filed no minority report. In many of its provisions I indorse the bill that has been reported. I served on the committee every day during its sessions, and I should say every hour of it, and on the subcommittee I missed only one day, and that was due to illness. To do justice to the gentlemen who served on that subcommittee, the chairman, Mr. ESCH, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], on the Republican side, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], on the Democratic side, I beg to say that I do not think that there ever was a more earnest effort, a more conscientious effort, made by any five men to try to serve the country's transportation needs in the best way that was possible to serve it through our efforts. [Applause.] I notified the chairman of the committee at the beginning that I was not going to play the rôle of a mere obstructionist. I tried to live up to that pledge, and I am going to try to live up to it now. This bill unamended, as compared to the Senate bill unamended, or as to any of the plans that have been proposed for private ownership and operation, I would accept most cheerfully this bill as reported in preference to any one of them. There are some features of the bill, however, that I wish to amend, because I think it would be better in the public interest that it should be so amended, but of course I shall take that matter up under the five-minute rule. The House has paid a compliment to the distinguished chairman of this committee, Mr. ESCH, equal to, if not exceeding, any compliment I have ever known to be paid to any member in the 23 years of my service in this House, not only by the great applause that he received at the close of his remarks, and the compliment that was paid him by every Member standing on his feet while we applauded him, but the highest compliment that could be paid to a man in charge of a bill was for the Members to sit so quietly as they did and listen to everything he said for nearly three hours.

I do not feel that I am worthy of such a compliment. I know that I shall not get it, but I do not care to waste any time here, and if gentlemen do not want to hear me say what I think ought to be said, I shall not blame any gentleman for leaving the Hall, but I hope that even with a smaller attendance I may receive at least good attention from those who remain.

This is a bill for the purpose of restoring the railroads to their owners for private operation. Taking the bill as a whole, it should be carefully considered in view of the objects sought and the purposes contemplated. As good a bill as this is compared with the Senate bill, in the main, I do not believe that it is advisable to return the railroads to private ownership and operation so early as the 1st of January next, and I will give my reasons for so believing. I do not say that in antagonism to the bill as an operating measure for the railroads when they are returned to private operation. The distinguished chairman put in some of his time, not much, however, in discussing the question of public ownership as presented in the Plumb plan. I want to say that I introduced that bill by request and I also offered to introduce any other bill proposing any plan of railway solution, in order that the committee might have jurisdiction and that we might have a hearing covering all of them. The chairman did give the proponents of plans all the hearing they asked for. None were ignored. If the Plumb plan is a good one, I am not entitled to any credit whatever, and if it is a bad one I am not responsible, unless merely introducing the bill by request makes me responsible for it. I have never been so narrow that I was not willing to give everybody a fair opportunity to serve the public as best he could. I do not believe that any of these plans or the present bill is or can be a permanent solution of the transportation problems of this country. There never has been a solution through private ownership and in my honest opinion there never will be, and why? Transportation should be furnished at its simple cost and nothing more. Private ownership can not function without profits on the part of the investor. It is nonsense to talk about private ownership if we do not couple with it profit upon the investment, because if you do not do that, then no person voluntarily is going to put any money into such a venture when he can put it somewhere else where he can make a profit. Transportation inherently, normally, and necessarily is a Government function, a Government duty, a Government obligation, and any private individual, corporation, or association of individuals that undertakes to discharge a public function, a Government duty, does so on his own initiative, voluntarily, and at his own peril, taking all chances for profit or loss. Why does he want to undertake such a service? The theory of private ownership and operation of railways has been based upon the idea that public ownership and operation would be less efficient and more expensive. If it is less efficient and more expensive, that is just as good an argument and as cogent a reason as any man can give for not favoring it. If a private owner of a transportation system furnishes transportation at less cost than can the Government and more efficiently and make a profit upon his investment satisfactory to himself, why not let him do it? I am in favor of whatever will give transportation at the least cost to the public and in the most efficient manner. We have had in this country for about 75 years—I do not remember just when the first railway was built—private ownership and operation of railroads.

Nobody is against transportation by rail per se. He could not be. There was no Government control or regulation of railroads prior to the act of 1887.

I do not remember just when the first State legislation with reference to control and regulation was passed, but I want to say that before there was any attempt at Government control and regulation there were receiverships too numerous to mention. It was a common thing for a railroad company to fail to meet its obligations and go into a hospital for financial recuperation—a receivership. Now, we can not lay blame on the State or National Governments for what happened to the carriers before there was any law providing for regulation. Yet we had numerous receiverships, even after the law of 1887 was passed and the courts had more or less emasculated it by taking away the authority which Congress thought it was conferring on the Interstate Commerce Commission. Finally, when Mr. Roosevelt became President, by one of the largest popular majorities any man up to that time had ever received, and without any platform pledge or party obligation to do so, he advocated strengthening the interstate-commerce laws so as to give the Interstate Commerce Commission some real power. I know what was said at that time. I was here; I know the talk that was had. Gentlemen would not say it on the floor of the House at this end of the Capitol or at the other, but members of his own party were simply furious with him for advocating that which no platform of his party had committed him to. But nevertheless he stood like a stone wall and advocated in his messages to Congress at that time—and which will bear reading again and again—that real power should be given to the commission. Finally, by reason of the great popular majority which he had received he forced through the act of 1906. I was not on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at that time. I attended the hearings held by the Senate committee upon the bill, which was afterwards known as the Hepburn bill. I heard everything that was said, and what I did not hear I read. That is the first act that put real power in the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, I want to say from the time the original act of 1887 was passed that no man can point to any receivership of any railroad in which it was either alleged or proved or even attempted to be proved that the cause of the railroad's troubles or the reason for its going into the hands of receivers was due to either State regulation, State legislation, or the action of a State commission, or due to national legislation, national regulation, or the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, then, who was to blame for the receiverships, almost by the hundreds, that came before there was any legislation on the subject of public control or regulation, and who was to blame since the act of 1887 for the numerous receiverships? Not so long back, even before the European war and before Government control of railroads, there were at one time about 40,000 miles of railroads in the United States in the hands of receivers. Why? No stronger evidence could be furnished, irrefutable and undeniable, that private ownership was a failure, and if it had not been there would not be annually an increased number of railroad hospital patients. Did they afford transportation at the cost of service? No. They are not asked to do it. Gentlemen have an idea that there is something sacred about the dollar invested in railroads that is not sacred in any other form or character of transportation facilities. Why, look at the highways, look at your streets everywhere in this country—all means of transportation. They are paid for entirely by taxes at public expense, maintained at public expense, and the user furnishes only the vehicle or equipment at private expense. The great investment in the highway is absolutely free. If we had never had public ownership of highways or public ownership of the hard-surfaced roads except by way of corporation ownership, operated at a profit, and we were now proposing to abolish private ownership and operation of such facilities of transportation the same howl would go up that is going up now. Why? There would be much money invested in them upon which a profit was being made; there would be job holders that would desire to hold on to their jobs in all respects like the railroad. Job holders are howling against Government ownership at this moment. Public ownership never comes as a mere matter of academic theory or advocacy, and it is not going to come in response to any mere academic discussion. Do you know up to this time I have never read a book on public ownership?

I have read everything I could on the other side that I had time to read, but, of course, not all that has been published on that side. I am of opinion that private ownership of railroads in this country will never develop it in every nook and corner where it ought to be developed, because it can not be done with a profit to investors and therefore never will be done. This bill, good as it will be if proper amendments are adopted, will simply meet the fate of all former attempts that have been made with private ownership, because it is in the very nature of things that any man who invests a dollar in anything for what he hopes to get back in the way of profits is going to do everything that he can to get as large a profit on his investment as he can. Do you tell me that anybody who loans money to a railroad company or buys stock in a railroad company does it simply for altruistic purposes, simply to serve the public? Why should any man do anything of that kind? We voted $200,000,000 in the last Congress as aid to highway construction in the States out of the Treasury of the United States. Why did we do it? Because we regarded it as our obligation and duty to serve a common public interest. Why should not private capital for profit construct these transportation facilities as do those who invest in railroads? I have never reached the point to this hour where I am willing to advocate both Government ownership and operation as being absolutely necessary. Why? I have had it dinned into my ears so long that in order to secure efficiency of service private initiative was absolutely necessary. Before I ever heard of the Plumb plan or one like it in all its details, I had reached the conclusion that the Government of the United States would have to absorb all the immovable property of the railroads of the country.

Why do I think so? The Government can acquire the rights of way, the terminals, and all the real estate, all the immovable fixtures that belong to the railroad, which constitute about 75 per cent in value of all railroad property, and collect a rental for use of same that will reimburse the Government for every cent it will have to invest a small additional amount sufficient to amortize completely and fully any indebtedness incurred in a reasonable time. The Government can borrow money at a cheaper rate of interest than any individual or railroad corporation, and its property will not be subject to taxation. With 75 per cent of the total investment in railroads amortized and forever removed from the cost of transportation, transportation can and will be much cheaper. As such an amendment is not germane I will not offer it to this bill, as I know it would be ruled out on a point of order, but I believe Government ownership to this extent will become absolutely necessary before many years, while leaving the railroads as owners of all equipment and movable fixtures, but providing that the Government of the United States may lease to the present corporations, who will remain the owners of their equipment, or to any other private corporation for operation of the railroads under such conditions and restrictions stipulated in the lease contracts as will enable the Government to thoroughly control the commerce of the country and protect it from such exploitation as has been resorted to in the past. The rights of way, terminal grounds, and all other forms of real estate holdings by the railroads have grown enormously in value by reason of the growth of the country, and the railroads are, under the law as construed by the decisions of the courts, entitled to a return on the value of all property held or used for carrier purposes. They receive a return on the community value, the unearned increment due to community growth, the same as they do on new money invested in additions and betterments. This unearned increment value amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars.

I do not think there is any doubt at this time that the terminal facilities of the railroads of the United States equal in value all the rest of their properties. And it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, as I understand it, in the Minnesota rate case, that railroads are entitled to this enhanced value, unearned increment, and that such element of value must be considered in rate making. Therefore they are entitled to a rate based upon value which they themselves have not contributed in any way. Now, if the Government acquires this real estate, it will not further burden the commerce of the country by way of increase in value of the property due to unearned increment. It can not further be the basis of additional issues of stock and bonds upon which interest and dividends must be paid. If the real estate holdings of the railroads are not taken over by the Government, this element of unearned value will go on forever or as long as the country grows. Then, as to an amortization fund, the Government must first pay itself out of rentals any interest which it has to pay on bonds that may be issued to acquire the property, then, in addition, a small amount, not over 1 per cent, perhaps, that will be used to amortize the property it has bought, and, when amortized, never thereafter to be considered in the making of a rate, fare, charge, or classification. With 75 per cent of the present value of railroads eliminated without increasing the burdens of the shipper or consumer over and above what they would have to bear if the roads continue in private ownership and continue to collect a profit on all its ever-increasing unearned values. Now, this amortization has got to come about. You may say what you please, but we face the inevitable. This country will not very much longer put up with what it has in the past.

Now, what is the condition existing as to the capitalization of railroads? Except in rare and isolated instances there has been absolutely no amortization of railroad investments since the beginning of railroad building, up to the present hour. All the capital that has ever been invested in the railroads in any form remains to-day wholly unamortized. And as a result we have a capitalization pyramid reaching to the skies, but it is an inverted pyramid. This capitalization pyramid is growing wider and wider and larger and larger, higher and higher, all the time, at its inverted apex. But under the present plans and present theories of private ownership and operation of railroads, nothing is provided for amortization. All the old capital remains in the pyramid and all the new capital is added to it. It is only a question of time when this inverted pyramid will topple over, and terrible will be the crash. We can not prevent it if we go on in the future as we have in the past. No man that owns a farm that has a mortgage on it, and never pays the mortgage off except by giving a new one, can ever be regarded as a successful farmer, although his neighbors around him may be successful farmers and build up the community, and in that way enhance values in the community to such an extent that this particular farmer may be enabled to continue to renew his mortgage so long as the community continues to grow, but when community growth ceases, this man must inevitably be sold out of house and home. But, my friends, it being a Government duty, a Government obligation, a Government function, to furnish transportation, the Government is not and must not be at the mercy of Wall Street. It is not and must not be at the mercy of a lot of investment bankers that want just as many so-called refunding operations as possible to go on continuously and forever. The Government can issue its bonds without maturity date, so that it may redeem any bond at any time when its revenues from the railroads will justify it. So in a comparatively little while, as the life of Governments go, this investment will be amortized. Then this investment will be free from taxation, as it ought to be.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I was wondering what you would do for the States. Would you not rob the States of their greatest resources, namely, railroad taxes?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. But I would not call it robbery. The railroads have been robbed by everybody so far. I should rob the State, as you call it—using an offensive term—of taxing that facility, which in turn its own citizens have to pay, not only the tax but a profit on the tax. If that is what you call "robbing your State," the sooner it is robbed the better. This does not prevent the State from collecting a tax. This plan will take the real estate—75 per cent of the value of railroads—out of taxation, but it leaves the equipment and the gross earnings of roads, and many States to-day tax the gross earnings of a road instead of its fixed property. Where does robbery come in?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. If you are going to tax them in another fashion, how are you going to help your Government in maintaining a railroad system without taxation?

Mr. SIMS. I said to the extent of 75 per cent of the whole present value of the roads, their immovable and fixed property.

Why do you not tax your highways, your public school buildings, your courthouses, your statehouses, your National and State Capitols? They are nothing in the world but public facilities. What is transportation? Transportation is movement of persons and property. If you move the people and move the property, you perform the function. It is not necessary to move a man in a palace car in order to move him.

What do you suppose the lowest passenger fare is in India? Two-fifths of 1 cent a mile. In India, under government ownership, they have the finest palace cars in the world, and the entire fare paid by a passenger on a palace car, including rail haul and all else, amounts to 1½ cents a mile. But it is almost nonsense to talk about other countries. Other countries know what is best for themselves, and they are doing what they think is the best for themselves. France will own every railroad within her borders in 1940 and get all the earnings. Germany makes a profit out of her railroads. I do not think they ought to be run for a profit. I am not in favor of a profit or in favor of profit sharing in public service necessary and essential to the life of a country. It will not work.

Over in Wall Street—and I use that word in no sense of prejudice—they are everlastingly and eternally discussing the question of railroad credit. Who has destroyed that credit? I just want to show you a few facts about a little railroad in my State. It is not so little, either, but it has never been in the hands of Wall Street that I know of. I want to show you the facts about it, and then just a few facts about other railroads that have had Wall Street help. The Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railroad, in Tennessee running from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Hickman, Ky., with branches, in 1917 owned and operated 1,237 miles. Part of that railroad between Nashville and Chattanooga is of extremely expensive construction. There are tunnels on it of a mile in length or more through granite mountains. There is a bridge across a river with an island in it where the bridge crosses, making the bridge necessarily long, and then it runs through the mountains in Georgia, extremely expensive of construction. West of Nashville, toward Hickman, is the Harpeth River to bridge and the Tennessee River to bridge—expensive construction. What do you suppose are the outstanding stocks and bonds against this railroad per mile? The outstanding stock of the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad, covering 1,237 miles, was on December 31, 1917, $16,000,000, total; per mile of stock, $12,935; bonds outstanding, $10,865,000; bonded indebtedness per mile, $10,400; total per mile, $23,335.

That road has been run from the beginning economically. Col. E. W. Cole, when I was a boy, was president of that road. He was a man who came up, I think, from the position of a section hand. When he ceased to be president J. W. Thomas, who was on the road at the time as general manager, was made president and general manager. He continued in the footsteps of Col. E. W. Cole, the first president in the management of that road, and when he died his son, J. W. Thomas, jr., was chosen president and general manager; and although the Louisville & Nashville bought a controlling interest in it many years ago the management and policy continued to be the same as it was through all prior years. At this time a son of Col. E. W. Cole is president of that road. A better railroad never served any people than that railroad. It has had no higher rates than any other road received for the same or like service. The management has always been and now is exceedingly accommodating, but the road has been managed so economically and in such a business-like way that they have amortized much of the investment as they went along instead of issuing more bonds and stock. Instead of going to Wall Street they amortized their debts for capital expenditures until to-day that road has only $23,000 per mile capitalization, both stock and bonds. No man who was president of that road ever received compensation as much as $20,000 per annum. Mr. Milton H. Smith, president of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., was, I believe, general manager of it for many years prior to becoming its president. He is one of the ablest railroad men in the United States from a practical standpoint, in construction, operation, and in every other respect, and he never received at any time during his long years of service over $25,000 a year salary, and when the Government took over the railroads his salary was only $20,000 a year.

Now, look at some of the lame-duck roads and see how they compare with the Nashville & Chattanooga and the Louisville & Nashville. I do not call the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad a lame duck; I ought not to so designate it; but let me tell you it has got the disease of overcapitalization, and if not cured it is going to die. What is the capitalization per mile of the Baltimore & Ohio, one of the oldest and best railroads in the country? Ninety-eight thousand nine hundred and seventy-nine dollars in bonds or fixed indebtedness per mile, and stock, per mile, $44,625; total of both, per mile, $142,804—double as much bonds as stock.

Now, look at its stock quotations to-day; way below par, both common and preferred. What do you suppose the railroad paid its president as salary during the year 1917? Seventy-five thousand four hundred and eighty dollars. While this road is not in the hands of a receiver, it is suffering from the disease of overcapitalization. What caused the road to get in that shape? Why did it not economize and pay less in salaries and pay more of its maintenance and improvement expenses out of earnings?

Now, let us take a look at the New York Central! I am comparing our little Nashville & Chattanooga road with great roads. The New York Central is one of the best roads in the country.

and serves the best portion of the United States with great freight and passenger traffic. I now read from a publication by James H. Oliphant & Co., 61 Broadway, New York, entitled "The Earning Power of Railroads, 1918–19," as to the mileage of the system, its stock issue, and bonded and other fixed-interest obligations, as follows:

New York Central Railroad.

Year.	Average miles operated.	Gross.	Surplus.
1908	3,781	$83,927,354	$8,931,600
1909	3,782	93,171,861	13,695,420
1910	3,785	99,908,478	14,288,672
1911	3,790	103,954,883	15,304,449
1912	3,791	109,900,015	13,879,837
1913	3,753	116,904,304	13,243,558
1914	3,774	112,741,051	8,688,672
1915	[1]5,640	167,912,333	27,711,474
1916	5,689	201,585,049	45,659,217
1917	5,685	216,267,517	25,593,220

STOCK OUTSTANDING DECEMBER 31, 1917.

Common	$249,849,360
Stock per mile of road operated	43,949

BONDS OUTSTANDING DECEMBER 31, 1917.[1]

Fixed interest	632,081,000
Equipment	43,584,086
Notes due 1919 (5 per cent)	15,000,000

This statement shows that the New York Central in 1917 had a fixed indebtedness linbility of $690,665,086, equaling $121,489 per mile of road operated, and $43,949 stock per mile of road operated, constituting a stock and bond capitalization of $165,338 per mile of line. How does the stock and bond capitalization compare with the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway, with its total capitalization of $23,335 per mile of road, consisting of stock $12,935 per mile and bonds of $10,400 per mile? Its total mileage in 1917 was 1,237 and its total bonded indebtedness being $12,865,000 and its total stock being $16,000,000, total of both being $28,865,000.

Does the statement of the New York Central indicate good management? It presents an object lesson in private ownership and management with public regulation. Let us take a look at the Seaboard Air Line, more or less a lame duck. If I recollect aright, its president gets $40,857, and another distinguished gentleman who has been before our committee very often receives $50,000 for being chairman of the board of directors. Now, what under heaven is the duties and services of a chairman of the board of directors? What does a chairman of the board of directors do in the way of railroad operation? A number of railroads before Government control paid their presidents larger salaries than that received by the President of the United States, and some of the lawyers were paid as much as $60,000 a year. Such is the fruit of private ownership, initiative, and operation. Take the New Haven, the Boston & Maine, and the Maine Central—all lame ducks. These properties furnish a rather recent object lesson of Wall Street management, after the properties were all built up and were serving the country, and the stock of some of them exceeded $200 per share in market value. Now the New Haven stockholder gets something over $32 a share. That is scientific private management directed from Wall Street.

Gentlemen, I offered an amendment in committee, and I am going to offer it in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Expense of operation is absolutely necessary. Therefore no expense as such should be incurred not necessary to operation of the railroads in its carrier functions. Coal or other fuel is absolutely necessary in running the trains. Therefore the cost of coal is an expense of operation. The cost of labor that keeps the tracks in condition and that operates the trains constitutes a necessary expense of operation. But show me what operative function any man can perform that is worth $75,000 a year.

One of these gentlemen, chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Union Pacific, gets more than $100,000 a year. My friend, Mr. Kruttschnitt, a very able railroad man, chairman of the board of directors of the Southern Pacific systems, gets over $88,000 a year. There are no Southern Pacific lines in New York, nor east of the Mississippi River. How does it happen that the chairman of the board of directors has to live in New York, unless the directors live there and he must be close to them?

[1] Includes $100,000,000 6 per cent debentures due 1935, convertible into stock at 105 to Apr. 30, 1925.

I am going to offer in the Committee of the Whole an amendment that I offered in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, providing that the compensation of no railway official in excess of $20,000 a year shall be charged to operating expenses. I have no objection to a man getting $500,000 a year if he gets it out of net income, out of the fund that would otherwise go to the stockholders. If they need $100,000 presidents, let them pay for them. The country does not need them. Now, look at the case of Mr. Hines. I want to compliment him. As an official and employee of the Santa Fe during the year 1917 he was receiving more than $75,000 a year, and was not president of the road. There is no question that he is one of the ablest railroad men in every way in the United States. But what did he do? He came here and worked for the Government throughout the war for $25,000 a year, which was $50,000 less than he was receiving from his corporation. He is still serving to-day for $25,000. He is operating all the railroads in the United States that have been taken over by the Government, and he is doing it efficiently, economically, and successfully. Could he have done any more for a privately owned road? While he gets only $25,000 as compensation, he is willing to continue the sacrifice he is making in the interest of the public. But some of the other gentlemen jumped their Government jobs just as quick as they could and went back to their old corporate service and, I suppose, at the old profiteering salaries. Now, I have no prejudice against these men. Many of them have come up from the ranks. But why should they receive such stupendous compensation and have it charged to operating expenses, and then complain that the railway laborers who actually perform the physical work, at least of operation, want more than they are getting? Why, my friends, if for no other reason than the effect that it would have on the morale of labor, this compensation should not be permitted to be charged to operating expenses or considered in any way a fair charge to operation in rate making by any regulatory body. I am going to give you an opportunity to vote on this amendment when the time comes, and if you do not vote for that, or some other amendment looking in the same direction, I will offer an amendment that you ought to vote for, and that is to pay the Interstate Commerce Commissioners $20,000 a year each. They have to represent the side of the whole public against all these high-salaried men, 208 of whom receive $20,000 and up to as high as $120,000 a year, charged to operating expenses. For the sake of consistency do not talk about putting felons' stripes and handcuffs on men who get $4 or $5 or $6 a day for extrahazardous physical and mental labor who may strike for higher pay and keep them off of men engaged in the same service whose compensation exceeds, in some instances, $75,000 to $100,000 a year. [Applause.] If the owners want to pay such salaries, let them in excess of $20,000 come out of the net earnings which go exclusively to the owners, as they are altogether responsible for the employment of these officials, and not saddle it on the consuming public under pretense that they are in any way necessary in operating the roads. A railroad official is a quasi public officer, because it is a public service that he is rendering. It is a Government function that he is exercising. The Attorney General of the United States represents the interests of the whole public, its 110,000,000 people, yet he gets only $12,000 a year. One of these railroad lawyers gets as high as $60,000 a year to represent a single system of railroads. Do you believe the stockholders would not be a little careful about these things if even a part of it had to come out of their "swag," to use a slang phrase?

Now, look at the difference in management. These railway officials are the direct employees of the owners, the stockholders. The bondholders have nothing to say unless they have the voting privilege. The stockholders elect the directors, and the directors employ the officials and fix their compensation, and the officials employ the wage earners. Therefore the stockholders have it absolutely in their power to stop this graft, for that is all it is. It looks like everybody thinks they must be turned loose on a railroad or its earnings in some way. The gentleman from West Virginia spoke about robbing the States. I want to call his attention to the way the States rob the railroads, and I am glad the gentleman is here. One State in this Union, the State of New Jersey, collects $3,500 per mile per year taxes on the railroads in that State, which is more than the net earnings per mile of line of a great many railroads.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does anyone demur to that procedure?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to discuss it in detail. What effect does it have? Several railroads run through New Jersey that go through a number of other States. Now, there are several railroads that run through New Jersey that also run through Pennsylvania or Maryland or Delaware or all these States. Now, if every State through which one of these railroads runs collected the same amount of tax that New Jersey collects, what freight rate do you imagine they would have to charge the shippers in order to recoup these excessive taxes?

There has been the worst kind of discrimination in the taxation of railroads by many States as compared with taxes on other property in the same States. My recollection is that Texas, with the largest railroad mileage of any State in the United States, has a total of taxation of $300 a mile of line. Little New Jersey, which you can nearly jump across from east to west, taxes the railroads $3,500 a mile of line. What effect does it have on the people these roads serve other than the people of New Jersey? All the revenues of a railroad must pay all of its operating expenses and charges, including taxes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to inquire how much the State of Tennessee collects in taxation of railroads?

Mr. SIMS. It is very little compared with some other States, I can not recall the exact amount. I do not think it exceeds $500 per mile of line. Some of these railroads run through three or four States besides New Jersey that do not collect the large taxes that New Jersey does. All these roads must charge the same rates and fares as those paid by New Jersey people. As all expenses of operation by any one of these roads must come out of all its earnings collected from all the shippers of all the States on its lines, and its rates must be made with reference to all its income and all its expenses as a whole, the excessive taxes collected by New Jersey and which are all spent in and for the benefit of New Jersey, in this way a part of New Jersey's local burdens are paid by people who do not live in New Jersey. But you may say, Why does not every State levy taxes equal to those of New Jersey? That is just what it is going to lead up to. They will say that if this great State of New Jersey gets $3,500 per mile of line in its territory, why should not we have the same rate of taxation? I want to say to you that taxes on railroads have increased in States, counties, and municipalities out of all proportion to taxes on any and all other kinds of property subject to taxation.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. New Jersey is a kind of a toll gate, is it not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; it enables New Jersey to get as a State what its people do not pay for in full as shippers. The taxes on railroads are increasing all the time, and why should they not? The temptation exists everywhere to soak them. The railroads are privately owned and operated for profit and therefore it is regarded by the taxing authorities that it is their duty to share in the profits by way of unjust and discriminating taxation.

What did the State of Illinois do? We have a member on the committee from Illinois, a good and faithful one. The New York Central wanted to mortgage its lines generally to get more money to use in its business, and it cost that railroad company not less than $250,000 just to record this mortgage in Illinois.

Mr. YATES. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SIMS. Three hundred thousand, the gentleman from Illinois, a former distinguished governor of the State, says. What operating transportation service was rendered by recording that mortgage? Was it not a pure, unadulterated rake-off simply because Illinois had the power? There may have been a kick by the railroad company, but it went along and paid the bill. It wanted to buy the balance of stock in the Lake Shore not owned by it, and in order to get the money had to give a mortgage covering all its lines of more than 5,000 miles, but less than 150 miles were in Illinois. That is one of the beauties of State regulation and control of privately owned railroads. It is a fine thing for a State to do such a thing when all the sum so collected was to be paid out in that State. No such a tax grab could be made by a State if the railroad had been owned by the Government.

Now, I know, as far as I am concerned, that it is nonsense to expect that Government ownership will be adopted by this Congress at this time because the railroad owners are not ready for it nor the investment bankers and other holders of stocks and bonds in the roads, and, as a matter of course, officials of the roads are not ready for it, as they expect to resume their old jobs at the old salaries.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I am always pleased to yield to our leader.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think that the people are ready for it—just the plain, ordinary, common people?

Mr. SIMS. If the plain, ordinary, common people knew the extent to which they are being robbed unnecessarily, they would be for it. It is not a theory that confronts us; it is a condition. I am not for Government ownership simply in theory, but I believe it is inevitable as a public necessity.

Mr. MONDELL. My question was not what might be sometimes.

Mr. SIMS. The very moment the Plumb plan was flashed over the wire gentlemen who never read it yelled out "sovietism, communism, socialism, taking the railroads from the owners and giving it to the employees." Nobody ever heard of this Association of Railroad Executives being called soviets or unions. But what is it but a union? Nobody ever heard of the Association of Security Holders or the committee headed by my pleasant friend, Mr. Warfield, being called a soviet or a capitalist union. What is it but a capitalist union? They were united to try to grab all they can in connection with reconstructive legislation. What more are the Plumb plan advocates doing?

Now, I will read from the railroad statistics of the United States of America brought up to December 17 by Mr. Thompson as I find them in the Railway News and Statistics. He is a decidedly prorailroad man and the statictics he gives are official. The best way to have an idea of operating expenses is to know what ratio they bear to gross earnings. The table in the publication referred to for 1917 is as follows:

Summary showing proportion of compensation of employees to gross earnings and operating expenses, and operating ratio for 20 years, 1917 to 1895.

[1] Class I and II roads only. The commission did not report the taxes of Class III roads for 1913 and 1914.
[2] Class III roads wages estimated in 1913.

The above table shows that the ratio compensation of labor to gross earnings in 1895 was 41.43 per cent, and was even less in 1916, covering a period of 21 years, and was only 43.71 per cent for the year 1917, the last year of private operation, or only 2.28 per cent higher than it was 22 years prior thereto. The same table shows that the ratio of labor to operating expenses for 1895 was 61.38 per cent, and only 61.78 per cent in 1917, 22 years later, and we had been in war for nearly a year.

This table also shows that the ratio of expenses and taxes to gross earnings in 1895 was 71.18 per cent, and in 1916 was only 70.04 per cent, but rose to 76.15 per cent for 1917. This table shows that the expense of operation chargeable to labor, compared with gross earnings, has been practically the same for a period of 22 years prior to Government control of railroads.

Remember that gross receipts measure actual performance, actual transportation, while net is anything that the robber management and robber tax-grabbing States and municipalities leave after they get through. Now, let us take the ratio of compensation of labor to operating expenses. Let us see how that has gained. The ratio of labor compensation to operating expenses in 1895 was 61.38 per cent and in 1917 it was 61.78. Does that indicate that labor is trying to rob the people?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that the last year which the gentleman has read was 1917, a year when the Government did not have control?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. And that that percentage for the year 1918 is considerably larger than the figures which the gentleman gives?

Mr. SIMS. It may be, because the railroads were then under Government control and operation, and it was war time, expenses had to be paid of all kinds and at war prices.

Mr. BLACK. I am not criticizing the figures——

Mr. SIMS. But we are returning the railroads to private ownership and operation after the war, and I am only reading statistics to show what they did before we were in war and when they were in private control.

Mr. BLACK. I merely called attention to the fact.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, certainly; that is all right. I am going to vote for this bill to turn them back, with proper amendments, and if I do not get the amendments I may vote for it anyway, as it is so much better than the Senate bill. This bill as a whole, unamended, is so far above the so-called Cummins bill as to be an angel of light in comparison with it. Therefore, I did not bring in a minority report, as I thought it might be better to accept it than a bill similar to the Senate bill. Let us take a look at the ratio of expenses and taxes to gross earnings as shown in the table I have read. In 1895 it was 71.18 per cent, and in 1916 it was even less—70.4 per cent. In 1917 it was 76.15 per cent after war expenses came on. We were in the war that year from April 6, but we did not take over the railroads until December 31, 1917. This table shows that the increase in expense compared with gross earnings was about on a parity, and that there was no foundation, so far as labor costs went, for a demand for increase in rates, but rates were increased 15 per cent prior to taking over the roads by the Government.

Let me show you the other end of the line, by comparing the pay of officials with the pay of employees who earn their living by the sweat of their brows—while the officials earn their living by the sweat of other people's brows. I use this same publication—comparative summary of average daily compensation of railway employees by classes, the years ending June 30, 1914, back to 1892. I am getting back to a period now when the war had no effect. Let us see how the increase in compensation of official employees compared with the increase in wages of all other employees. The average pay per day of railway officials in 1892 was $7.62, and was $16.06 per day in 1914, an increase of nearly 150 per cent. It gradually went up all of the time. These are the high-salaried officials that the directors actually employ themselves, including general managers and presidents. Their profiteering salaries are charged up to operating expenses, just the same as the laboring man's pay is charged to operating expenses. On page 65 of the same publication appears the following statement as to average daily compensation from June 30, 1914, back to 1892:

With every innovation in the system of reporting the number, classification, and compensation of railway employees, it becomes increasingly difficult to get a proper perspective in regard to this very important feature of railway statistics. In the next statement is preserved the record for the 18 classes into which railway employment was divided from the date of its institution by Prof. Henry C. Adams until it was superseded, in 1915.

[1] Pay of general officers in 1913 and 1914 out of proportion because returns do not include Class III roads. Other officers included under general officers in 1892 and 1893.
[2] Averages do not include returns for switching and terminal companies since 1908.

I invite your attention to this table, as it is very illuminating. It shows for the 22 years it covers, from 1892 to 1914, inclusive, that under private ownership and operation, with Government regulation, that the compensation of general officers has gone from $7.62 per day in 1892 up to $16.06 per day in 1914.

Other officers from $5.75 per day in 1894 to $6.48 per day in 1914.

General office clerks from $2.20 in 1892 to $2.54 in 1914.

Station agents, $1.81 per day in 1892 to $2.33 per day in 1914.

Other station men from $1.68 in 1892 to $1.98 in 1914.

Enginemen, $3.68 in 1892 and $5.24 in 1914.

Firemen, $2.07 in 1892 and $3.22 in 1914.

Conductors, $3.07 in 1892 and $4.47 in 1914.

Other trainmen, $1.89 in 1892 and $3.09 in 1914.

Machinists, $2.29 in 1892 and $3.27 in 1914.

Carpenters, $2.08 in 1892 and $2.66 in 1914.

Other shopmen, $1.71 in 1892 and $2.36 in 1914.

Section foremen, $1.76 in 1892 and $2.20 in 1914.

Other trackmen, $1.22 in 1892 and $1.59 in 1914.

Switchmen, flagmen, and watchmen, $1.78 in 1892 and $1.71 in 1914.

Telegraph operators and dispatchers, $1.93 in 1892 and $2.56 in 1914.

Employees, account floating equipment, $2.07 in 1892 and $2.35 in 1914.

All other employees and laborers, $1.67 in 1892 and $2.20 in 1914.

It appears in this summary that during the 23 years covered by it that the increase in the compensation of general officers had been more than 100 per cent, while in no class of other officials and employees had the compensation increased to the same percentage, while, as will appear by inspection, some classes had practically no increase. This period was one of undisturbed normal conditions, and demonstrated clearly that the tendency under private ownership and control is to give increases in the compensation of general officers out of all proportion to all other officers and employees.

If these railway officials, who are quasi public officials, would take their hands off the throats of the people, at least to the extent of not asking for all their princely compensation to be charged up to operating expenses, no doubt the effect on the morale of all other officials and employees would be very good and have a tendency to prevent any excessive demands on the part of all other officials and employees, who feel that they are being discriminated against in compensation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I have not had the opportunity yet to read this bill thoroughly. Does it contain a provision that will permit some regulatory body to have control over some of the unreasonable salaries which unquestionably have been paid? If it does not contain a provision of that kind, it certainly ought to.

Mr. SIMS. It does not. I offered an amendment in the committee and it was voted down, and I will offer it again in the Committee of the Whole providing that not exceeding $20,000 per annum of the compensation of any railway official shall be charged to operating expenses or be considered in rate making. They can be paid what they please above that amount out of net earnings; I do not care how much, even up to $500,000, so long as it is not included in expenses of operation or considered in rate making. You all know one New York Central official, a very distinguished man, chairman of the board of directors, who was getting $25,000 a year as chairman.

He used to be a United States Senator. He has made so many birthday anniversary speeches since he was 80 years old that I have forgotten how old he is. He is not like Uncle JOE, who never knew when to quit work; we could properly charge his salary to "expense of operation," as it is so meager in proportion to the benefit the Nation gets out of the work he does for his country. But here is a man who is paid $25,000 as chairman of the board of directors. Pray tell me what service he renders or can render at his advanced age that in justice to the shippers of the New York Central to charge to expenses of operation? If it is intended as an old-age pension, all well and good, but it should come out of net earnings.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand why the directors of a railroad company have to have a chairman that receives a princely salary. I had supposed that a chairman of a board of directors of any corporation was one of the directors elected for the position more in the nature of a compliment than anything else. What service does he render that entitles him to receive a salary in excess of that paid the president of the same railroad? I have often heard that there was a custom that had grown up in New York City to pay $20 to a director of a railroad company and perhaps directors of some other corporations for each directors' meeting that he attended. I have also heard that directors' meetings are nearly always held at night, and that often directors, or some of them, by putting on high speed are enabled to attend a large number of meetings on the same night, thereby raking in a goodly sum of operating expenses without losing any time from their business in daytime. When I first heard of this custom I supposed it was intended as tips to the pauper members of the boards of railroad directors, who would not otherwise be able to pay street car fare and would have to walk, and that having to attend so many meetings in one night would impose too much walking on directors who might be 80 years old or older. I am told that some of the pauper directors never know when to die.

Now, I am thoroughly in accord with Mr. ESCH's program, with a few exceptions. I am not in favor at this time and may never be of amending or repealing the Sherman antitrust law so as to nullify the Supreme Court's decision in so many cases, especially the Northern Securities case. I am also opposed to permitting mergers, and also to repealing the antipooling laws. The only competition we now have left is competition in service, and now we are asked to let them merge their properties or pool earnings and thus destroy even the little service competition remaining. In 1912, I believe it was, when Mr. MANN, who never slacks on any job and who did more in the way of hard and slavish work that others will not do than any man I ever knew, was chairman of the committee, during the administration of Mr. Taft, there came in a bill introduced by then Representative TOWNSEND, now Senator TOWNSEND, backed by the administration and supported by Mr. Wickersham, a very able man, who was the Attorney General, that proposed to let railroads consolidate, which provided that the contract consolidating the roads must be submitted to a United States court in the form of a moot-trial proceeding, and unless found by the court not to be in violation of the antitrust laws it was not to go into effect.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman means 1910.

Mr. SIMS. We were not in power then.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. MANN was not chairman of the committee then.

Mr. SIMS. The election was in 1912, was it not?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In 1909 he submitted that.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Taft was President. When did we win the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The Democrats came into power in the lower House in March, 1911.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Taft was President at the time I refer to.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. But Mr. MANN was not chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is right, but the date means nothing. But it was proposed there that a suit in court on the facts or statement of facts should determine in advance that the merger did not violate the Sherman antitrust law. Now, by this bill we propose to repeal the railroad part of the Sherman law, that part which prevents mergers and pooling. We refused to repeal it at the time I referred to, or even to go as far in that direction as did the Townsend bill, although backed by the then Republican administration. Now, you want the Sherman antitrust law, in so far as the railroads are concerned, repealed directly, provided the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the railroads always have denounced because they could not use it, approves the merger. Now, I am opposed to that, and I am going to vote against it, and I am going to move to strike it out. I am opposed to the guaranty feature, and I am going to move to strike that out. What is the guaranty feature? It is to let the standard return continue for six months in behalf of all the railroads that make application and file a rate schedule for increases within 60 days from approval of this act. Now, my friends, if we are going to continue the standard return as a guaranty, we ought to continue Government control of all the roads. If some of them earn more than the rental charge, it will help to take care of the lame duck that does not make the standard rental. But under this bill it is only the railroads that make application and file schedules for rate increases that get the guaranty. What railroads will apply? The Union Pacific will not apply, because it is paying 35 per cent to the Government in excess of the standard return. As long as the Government continues control of the railroads we have the absolute assurance from the Railroad Administration that the rates will not be further increased by the Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the gentleman's position to be that if the guaranty continue—that is, the guaranty for a period of six months—that must be based on the earnings of all the roads and not simply on the raods that may apply?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Just as now the Government pools all the earnings and guarantees a standard return?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it is limited to those who apply, those who make large returns will not participate in this guaranty?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; the Government stands all the loss and gets none of the gain. Is there any man in this House, Democrat or Republican, on an issue like that, will go before the people next year and defend his action to their satisfaction? It is a subsidy pure and simple, and not like the proposed ship subsidy, that was intended to build up a merchant marine that did not exist. We have the railroads now, and this subsidy has no excuse of the kind that was urged in behalf of the proposed ship subsidy. But now we must help the New Haven and the Boston & Maine and the Maine Central on account of their troubles that Wall Street got them into at a time when there was no excuse for it at all except greed. Do you remember what President Cleveland said? He said, in substance, "Good intentions and idle patriotic aspirations can not contend for the mastery against the combined efforts of avarice and greed." Never was a truer statement made on earth. Here is proposed a pure subsidy for six months. Well, I offered an amendment in the committee to strike it out. We provide for loaning money to them direct, if they need it. Now, we in this bill propose to pay them for six months a sum equal to the difference in what they make and the standard return, which is an absolute gift, an absolute donation; it is the worst form of subsidy; it is not done in aid of a new industry.

I am in favor, though, and shall offer an amendment along that line, of forbidding any foreclosure proceedings or the levying of executions or attachments upon any railroad property for 12 months following the release of the railroads from public control. I will offer a moratorium provision to prevent the enforced sale of any railroad property for one year. Let us protect them from the avarice of those who would foreclose mortgages on them at the very time they are least able to pay their indebtedness. I offered it in committee, but it was not adopted. I am opposed to any Government guaranty in any form or by continuing to pay a war rental with no war use of the roads. The war has been over 12 months to-day, so far as concerns hostilities.

What are you gentlemen from Iowa going to say? One gentleman from that State is on the committee, a fine man and an efficient Member. What is he going to say? The price of hogs has gone down $10 a hundred and the price of corn 50 cents a bushel. Is he going to vote for a law continuing war prices for and in behalf of railroads, to be paid by taxation, with the war prices of Iowa farm products going down every day? Will he do this in behalf of privately owned and operated railroads? What do you all from Iowa think of such a subsidy as this at such a time as this? You will hear from those Iowa farmers if you vote to pay a war-time subsidy 18 months after the war is over and after these privately owned and privately operated railroads are no longer performing any war service and the farmers have to pay war taxes in order to pay, after war purposes and necessities no longer exist, in order to pay this subsidy, with ever-declining prices of their products.

Now, there are a few other minor amendments that I expect to offer. I hope we can depend on Republicans to save the Sherman antitrust law, as they claim it to be a Republican law. They have preached it from the housetops. Are they now going to take a backward step? But I want to say to all my friends on both sides that I think the best thing we can possibly do for the good of the whole country—and that is what we ought to favor—is to provide that Government control shall continue until December 31, 1921, or until Congress otherwise orders. We are not going to get any bill passed by the 31st day of December next unless the Senate takes up this bill and passes it with practically no consideration, which would not be a wise thing to do and not in keeping with the way the Senate does, by any means. Now, we ought to pass a little bill, which I introduced, to continue Government control and operation of railroads until December 31, 1921, with the present guaranty, which is the highest rate of net return the railroads ever had in any three years of their existence and receiving it after the war and with no war services to perform, or until Congress otherwise orders.

Now, why do I want to put it off that far? I know that Congress can not and will not pass this or any other comprehensive bill by the 31st of December, 1919.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Would that cost more or less than the six months' guaranty you have just been speaking about?

Mr. SIMS. In just a minute. I want to show the impracticability of securing wise legislation in 1920. The States will be instructing delegates to a national convention by possibly as early as March, April, and May. We will have perhaps all national conventions not later than the month of June. Issues will be made upon these questions and then the whole problem will go into politics in spite of anything that anybody can do. When politics goes into business, business takes a back seat. To-day no railroad legislation can be had that will secure the best results. With the election of 1920 over, and with a new administration, be it Republican or Democratic, or mixed, and with a new President, with one-third of the Senate new, and all the House new, and the platforms of all parties having been considered and passed on by the voters, which will have its effect so far as public opinion is concerned, and then when none of us are candidates for reelection and none of the Senators are candidates for immediate election, let us have an extra session—and we will be sure to have it; if a Republican Congress and Republican President are elected there is no doubt about it—let it be called to meet just as soon after the 4th of March as possible, and then take up railroad legislation exclusively at a time when nothing but the country's conditions and the general public interest is to be considered and acted on. In the meantime there will no doubt be a tranquilization of labor disturbances so prevalent at this time. Labor will have passed through the reorganization stage, Wall Street will have passed through its reorganization period, the Members of the House and Senate will have passed through it. Then, if we are going to have private ownership we will have the time necessary to make the best of it that we can. If we are going to have public ownership we will have time to consider it and make the best of it that we can. What will take place between now and that time will be the greatest source of enlightenment. By passing my bill there will be no further general increases in freight rates for the farmer to pay during this period of falling prices for all he produces.

The Government made $22,000,000 clear in September in excess of the standard return. It will not make it each month, but for the next year it will no doubt make a large surplus with normal conditions. We know if we pass my bill and the President signs it, which I have no doubt he will be glad to do, we will have two years, if we want it and need it, in which to legislate. At least, we will not be working under pressure; not under forced draft. We are all anxious to go home, breathe a little fresh air out of Washington. This is not the way to rush through legislation like this, under special rule, with whip and spur. The committee has done its duty faithfully. I have no complaint to make against the committee, but I have the amendments that I have suggested to offer, and there may be some others that may be offered, and if the bill is amended as I think it ought to be I am going to vote for it as the best thing that can be enacted at this time. I told the chairman when it was first introduced that I thought it was the best solution for private ownership and operation that could be passed by both Houses of Congress by January 1, 1920. But general increases in freight rates would certainly come with the return of the roads to their owners, but would not come if Government control continued.

After this bill is discussed and amended in Committee of the Whole I will offer as a substitute the bill I have mentioned, if not subject to a point of order, as being the best thing that we can do that will not result in an increase of rates and without danger; at least with less danger of bringing about further labor trouble. Let us give the country time to become tranquil, and let us act after the elections of 1920 are over at a time when we can act solely and alone from what appears to be for the best interests of the whole country.

Mr. Chairman, under date of November 1, I addressed the following letter to the executive committee of the National Plumb Plan League, with headquarters in this city. A copy of that letter I now make a part of my speech:

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE PLUMB PLAN LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: As I introduced, by request, the bill now called the Plumb plan bill, I naturally have many inquiries as to just what is intended to be accomplished by its enactment. I do not feel entirely competent to reply to such inquiries on my own responsibility; therefore, I ask you to give me a succinct, but plain and easily understood, statement of what is expected to be accomplished by the enactment of the Plumb plan bill, as I want to use it in making replies to any and all inquiries along the line I have indicated.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) T. W. SIMS.

I received the following reply to my letter, signed by our former colleague, Hon. Edward Keating:

THE PLUMB PLAN LEAGUE HEADQUARTERS,
MUNSEY BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., November 5, 1919.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: The members of the executive committee of the National Plumb Plan League have asked me to reply to your letter of November 1, in which you ask for an "easily understood statement" of what its sponsors hope to accomplish through the enactment of the so-called Plumb plan for democratic control of the transportation system of the Nation.

Perhaps the best way to get at the issue would be to ask ourselves a few frank questions and to endeavor to make equally frank replies.

Why did the Federal Government take over the railroads?

What is the status of the railroad problem after two years of Government control?

What is the Plumb plan, who are responsible for it, and what do they hope to accomplish?

WHY ROADS WERE TAKEN OVER.

The Federal Government took over the railroads in the winter of 1917–18, because private ownership had utterly collapsed. That may seem a strong statement, but an examination of the facts will reveal that it is entirely truthful and conservative.

The United States became involved in the World War in the spring of 1917. Our associates in Europe told us frankly that they needed food, munitions, and supplies of all kinds, and that unless we could meet their needs promptly and generously they could not hope to withstand the attacks of the German hosts.

The Government appealed to the railroads to do their part in getting the materials required to the seacoast, so they might be transported across the Atlantic. Private ownership was in complete control and was receiving the aid and encouragement of the Government; yet it broke down at practically every point.

Finally the President of the United States received an imperative cablegram from the premiers of the allied powers, stating that instead of making good on our promises we had only delivered about 50 per cent of the tonnage guaranteed.

They made it very clear that unless we could redeem our promises the allied cause was seriously jeopardized.

With this Macedonian cry ringing in his ears, the President took over the railroads, and almost instantly the stream of supplies for Europe grew in volume and eventually it surpassed the most optimistic estimates of those in authority.

Here is a fact that those who sneer at Government ownership should bear in mind: For the greater part of a century private ownership had control of the railroad systems of this country—it was the recipient of special privileges valued at billions of dollars—and yet when subjected to the supreme test of war it failed.

And here is another fact that should be borne in mind: While the National Railroad Administration has been guilty of many blunders, and some of the responsible officials of extravagances that border on criminality, nevertheless, history will record that Government control succeeded where private ownership had failed.

WHAT RAILROAD OWNERS ASK.

What is the status of the railroad problem?

We hear a great deal of talk about returning the railroads to their owners, and undoubtedly many people imagine that the owners of railroad securities are merely asking that their properties shall be returned in the condition in which the Government found them.

Of course, you and I know that is not the case. If the Government were to throw the railroads back on their owners' hands, scores of systems would be in bankruptcy inside of 90 days, and this country would probably be convulsed by a most serious panic. This despite the fact that the Government had expended hundreds of millions for improvements and new equipment.

What is proposed is that the railroads shall be returned with a guaranty by the Government that the stockholders shall receive for a period of six months dividends at the highest rate known in the history of American railroading.

In addition, it is proposed that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be instructed to fix rates so that those dividends may be continued, and in order to still further facilitate matters it is suggested that the Government open the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of assisting in refinancing the roads.

Nowhere is adequate provision made to squeeze the billions of "water" out of the securities with which the various lines are burdened, and undoubtedly the railroad interests intend that the people shall be taxed, through increased freight and passenger rates, so that exorbitant dividends will be paid not only on genuine investments but on the "shadow dollars" which represent the loot of the Morgans, the Goulds, and the other financial buccaneers who dominated the railroad world in "the good old days."

That this is true is proved by Wall Street's insistence that the railroads are worth $20,000,000,000. Even Members of Congress have fallen into the error of accepting those figures.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has for years been conducting an inquiry into the value of the roads, and the figures so far made public by the commission indicate that, instead of being worth $20,000,000,000, the roads could be reproduced for $12,000,000,000.

The quotations on railroad securities posted on the New York Stock Exchange every day confirm those figures. If the Government could step into the exchange to-day and buy every bond and every share of stock at the prices quoted, the total expenditure required would not exceed $12,000,000,000.

I remember in the old days we used to get red in the face denouncing Government subsidies for various enterprises, but the ancient ship-subsidy scheme and kindred projects were of little importance compared with this proposition put forward by the railroad executives in legislation now pending before Congress.

WOOLLEY PREDICTS INCREASED RATES.

Right here, in passing, may I call your attention to the statement from Interstate Commerce Commissioner R. W. Woolley, which recently appeared in the public press, in which that distinguished authority warns the American people that the return of the railroads to private ownership will mean an increase in freight and passenger rates of 25 per cent and may be more?

I need not tell you that this means an addition of almost a billion dollars to the freight bills of the shippers of this country, and that a billion dollars in freight charges, by the time it is finally passed on to the ultimate consumer, who pays all bills in this country, will expand to three to five billions. That would inevitably force a further increase in the price of the necessaries of life, and I think you will agree with me that our country is scarcely in a position to face that kind of a calamity.

PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THE PLUMB PLAN.

And now as to the Plumb plan itself.

There are approximately 2,000,000 organized railroad workers in the United States. They belong to 14 national and international organizations.

From the very nature of things they are deeply interested in the solution of the railroad problem. They sat by while statesmen of all parties, the railroad executives, and committees representing railroad stockholders submitted plans for railroad legislation, and finally they decided to submit a plan of their own.

It is called the Plumb plan because the author is Glenn E. Plumb, the attorney for the affiliated railroad labor organizations and one of the great authorities on every question relating to the railroad issue.

The Plumb plan was submitted to the representatives of the 14 railroad organizations, and after months of study and many amendments was unanimously indorsed. Since then it has secured the support of practically the entire labor movement and many influential farm organizations. A bill embodying the Plumb plan was presented to Congress by yourself on August 2, 1919.

OWNERS TO BE COMPENSATED.

It provides that the Government shall retain control of all the railroads and that the owners of the roads shall be compensated for every dollar honestly invested.

The opponents of the Plumb plan are fond of charging that it is proposed to "confiscate" the holdings of the security holders. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Section 3 of your bill creates a railways board of appraisement and extension. This board is empowered to ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid by the United States to the owners of the several transportation properties. It is specifically provided—

The appraisement board shall ascertain the value of all the rights, property investments, powers, authorities, and privileges granted in and acquired under the charters of the several corporate owners, and the laws under which they operate and the grants made to individual owners owning or operating such properties.

That all values not included in the grants made in the charters of the corporate owners or the laws under which they operate, or in the grants made to individual owners, shall be regarded as values retained by the public in the public highways of the United States and not subject to compensation.

In the event that the appraisement board and the owners of the property can agree on a price, the Government will at once compensate the owners in cash.

CASH OR BONDS IN PAYMENT.

If an agreement can not be reached the owners have a right to appeal to the courts, and eventually to the Supreme Court of the United States.

At every point in the proceedings the owners' interests are safeguarded, and therefore there can be no question that they will receive every dollar to which they are entitled.

Payment for the property is to be made either through the issuance of bonds to the owners, or through the sale of bonds and the payment of cash to the owners.

Having secured control of the roads, it is proposed that they shall be operated by the national railways operating corporation. The bill says "the purpose of said corporation shall be for public service and not for private profit," and therefore the corporation will issue no stocks or bonds.

It is to be managed by a board of directors of 15 members. Five of these directors are to represent the classified employees of the railway lines, five the official employees, and five are to be designated by the President of the United States. The "official employees" will include all holding supervisory positions, while the rank and file of the workers will make up the "classified employees."

The board of directors thus made up will be authorized to operate all the transportation lines in the country.

All questions concerning wages and working conditions are to be disposed of by a central board of wages and working conditions, composed equally of representatives of the classified employees and the official employees. In case this board can not reach a majority decision an appeal may be taken to the board of directors.

RATES FIXED BY INDEPENDENT BODY.

Freight and passenger rates are to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will be independent of the national railways operating corporation, and which, as now, will be named by the President of the United States and will in no way be controlled by the railway employees.

The opponents of the Plumb plan say we are proposing to turn the railroads over to the employees without any restrictions, and that through combination between the official employees and the classified employees they could boost wages to any figure they saw fit, and compel the rest of the community to foot the bill.

There is nothing to this contention. In the first place the Interstate Commerce Commission has sole power to fix rates, and the commission would continue to be an independent body. Of course, wages could not be raised unreasonably without an increase in rates, and there the commission would have the veto power. Then Congress, representing all the people, would be in a position to intervene, and public sentiment would undoubtedly compel it to act if any such holdup were attempted.

We think we have safeguarded this provision by providing that all surplus earnings, resulting from increased efficiency of employees, shall be divided equally between the Treasury of the United States and the employees. The portion set aside for the employees shall be divided between the classified employees and the official employees, but every official employee is to receive at least twice the rate of dividend that is given to the classified employee.

A BARRIER AGAINST COLLUSION.

As there are a hundred times as many classified employees as there are official employees, it can be seen at once that it would be mathematically impossible to figure out any scheme by which the official employees could go into a conspiracy with the classified employees to secure a salary increase without sacrificing their own financial interests. In other words, it is demonstrable that the official employees can get more through their share of the savings than they could get from any possible division with the classified employees. This method of sharing dividends sets up a natural barrier against collusion.

Of course, it is conceivable that some better scheme for regulating wages may be suggested. If so, I want to assure you we are prepared to give it consideration, because the railroad workers of this country have no desire to gouge their fellow citizens.

Another criticism directed at the Plumb plan is that we propose to take the management of the lines from those who have demonstrated their ability and vest it in workers who lack managerial experience.

Let us examine that objection for a moment.

Who "runs" the railroads of the United States to-day?

First, we have in Wall Street a number of gentlemen who by devious methods remain in control of the railroads, but they do not run the roads in the sense of operating them. They have no technical knowledge of the railroad business, and confine themselves exclusively to the work of financing the roads. In many instances they use this power to finance in such a way as to exploit the roads to the detriment of the stockholders and of the community at large. Is it necessary for me to remind you of the New Haven scandal and countless other deals of the same unsavory character?

The real work of operation is carried on by the official employees and the classified employees—2,000,000 of them.

HOW WALL STREET WOULD BE ELIMINATED.

Now, under the Plumb plan there would be no need of retaining the services of these Wall Street gentlemen, because no one would be permitted to either finance or exploit the railroads of the United States. The financing would be taken care of when the Government took over the roads and compensated the owners. Exploitation would become a matter of ancient history.

Under the new dispensation the sole duty of the board of directors would be to actually manage the railroads of the country.

That being true, where could you secure more efficient managers than from the official employees and the classified employees? Add to these five distinguished business and professional men, selected by the President of the United States, and you would have such a board of directors as no railroad has had in the history of the industry.

What do we hope to accomplish by the enactment of the Plumb plan?

First, we hope to place this great industry, which is so essential to the happiness and well-being of our people, in a position where it will be operated for service and not for profit. This means that industry everywhere will be stimulated; that one section or one city will not be developed at the expense of another section or another city, but that every part of the country will receive the same treatment as every other part.

WORKERS NO LONGER MERE COGS.

Second. Two million American workers will cease to be mere cogs in a machine and will become full partners in their country's greatest business enterprise. Such a change will have the same effect on them that political liberty had on their fathers more than a century ago. Before 1776 governments were run like railroads were run in this country prior to 1917. A few kings, princes, and dukes "financed," "exploited," and "directed," and the great mass of the people paid the bill.

And then America laid down the proposition that governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed and every citizen over 21 who was not in a jail or an insane asylum became a partner in the Government.

Of course, a great many good people wagged their heads and said the thing could not be done; that these rough, uneducated men would destroy government and plunge society into the vortex of anarchy. These fears were never realized, and now all over the world even kings are accepting the "American" idea.

The Plumb plan proposes to do for the railroad business what the Declaration of Independence did for the business of government. Surely the workers who are permitted to participate in the election of public officials from constable to President of the United States should be capable of selecting a member of a board of directors of a great industry which furnishes them with their bread and butter.

WOULD AMERICANIZE RAILROADS.

Some people speak of the Plumb plan as an attempt to socialize the railroads of the country. Others say it means nationalization, but, to my mind, it contemplates the Americanization of the railroads. It is an American plan, formulated by an American, and sponsored by organizations whose Americanism can not be questioned.

If we are not careful, however, America will not be the first to adopt this American plan. The cables tell us that the British Government has submitted to the railway workers and the latter have accepted a proposition which looks to the adoption of the essential principles of the Plumb plan. If this scheme goes through—and it undoubtedly will—the railroads of the United Kingdom will be managed by a board of directors of 12, 4 to be selected by the owners of the roads, 4 by the employees, and 4 by the Government. Two of the Government's representatives, however, are to be members of organized labor. Thus organized labor will have 6 members, while the public and the owners will have an equal number.

This probably gives the organized workers greater power than they would have under the Plumb plan, but the railroad men of of America, as represented by the railroad organizations, are not seeking power, but industrial freedom.

ONLY PLAN WHICH REDUCES RATES.

Third. The Plumb plan is the only suggestion now before the American people which guarantees a decrease in freight and passenger rates. All the other plans call for increases. The Plumb plan directs that whenever the net earnings of the roads shall exceed 10 per cent of the gross operating revenues the Interstate Commerce Commission shall automatically order a 5 per cent decrease in rates.

In practical operation this scheme would work as follows: Let us suppose that the gross operating revenue amounted to $4,500,000,000 and that the profits, or net earnings, totaled $500,000,000, or more than 10 per cent. One-half of this latter sum, or $250,000,000, would be divided between the employees, official and classified. The other $250,000,000 would be turned into the Treasury of the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission would at once order a 5 per cent blanket decrease in freight and passenger rates.

EFFECT OF DECREASED RATES.

See what would follow: Without new economies or new business the profits the next year would be only $250,000,000, and the employees and the Government would receive only half the amount of the year before. But decreased rates mean more business; and also, the reduction in dividends would stimulate the employees to improve their operation by applying better methods. So the tendency would be to assure constantly decreasing rates, to add to the volume of business, and to give the most efficient service human ingenuity and devotion could provide.

Decreased rates mean cheaper commodities; and so, through the effectiveness of the railroads, the purchasing power of money would be increased not only for the railroad man but for every wage earner and every purchaser.

The Plumb plan provides still another method by which rates may be reduced.

The Government can secure the money to purchase the lines at 4½ per cent. Under private ownership the public will be taxed to pay not less than 6½ per cent and in all probability more.

Under the Plumb plan the "water" will be taken out of railroad securities, and 4½ per cent will be paid on $12,000,000,000.

Under private ownership the "water" will not be taken out, and at least 6½ per cent will be paid on $20,000,000,000.

Under the Plumb plan the interest charge would be $540,000,000, and under private ownership $1,300,000,000.

The difference would remain in the pockets of the American people in the form of reduced freight and passenger rates.

RAILROADS OUT OF POLITICS.

Fourth. The Plumb plan would take the railroads out of politics forever and thus remove one of the most pernicious influences in public life.

Fifth. The Plumb plan would develop American waterways to the European standards. The railroads have strangled water transportation in this country and will continue to do so under private ownership. In Europe the canals and rivers carry the greater part of the bulky freight, and the railroads remain free to perform their legitimate functions.

Sixth. The Plumb plan will end speculation, stock jobbing, and Wall Street gambling so far as railroad securities are concerned.

The importance of this can not be appreciated unless one is familiar with what congressional investigations have revealed concerning the manipulation of railroad securities.

You will recall the Pujo report made to Congress in 1913. It showed that while 700,000 people owned railroad stocks and bonds, four great banks in New York controlled all the important lines of transportation in this country.

They ruled like feudal barons, not because they actually owned the stock of the roads but because they were in a position to manipulate the cards according to Wall Street's rules.

In that way they secured power such as no citizen, or combination of citizens, should possess in a republic.

Seventh. The Plumb plan would solve our industrial problem, so far as one great basic industry is concerned. Men do not strike against themselves, although they have the right to do so. Assured of wages which would enable them to live according to American standards, and guaranteed a share in the savings produced by their skill and industry, the railroad workers would have a compelling interest in the uninterrupted operation of the great lines of transportation.

AS THE WORKERS VIEW IT.

In conclusion, my dear Judge, may I say that one of America's greatest writers caught the spirit of this movement for industrial democracy when he quoted a railroad worker as making the following reply to the question, "Why the Plumb plan?":

It means that I will work for myself; I will work for my neighbors; for the public. It means that I will no longer work for Wall Street; for the banking syndicate that rules the railroads for private profit; for speculation; for robbery; it means that I am to be a free man, as was my father, who carved out his own fortune in free America.

This is what the Plumb plan means. It is a declaration of independence for 2,000,000 workingmen. It means that we will use our brains as well as our hands; that we will put 100 per cent of ourselves into our jobs. We will do this not because we will share in the savings due to our own efficiency but because we are working at a common undertaking that we want to make a success.

This is the Plumb plan. It means freedom—freedom for you; freedom to the manufacturer from discriminatory rail rates; freedom to the farmer to bring his produce direct to the consumer. It means transportation at cost. And it means to me that I become a servant of the American people in the best sense of the term. Under the Plumb plan I will work for my country and for myself as well.

This is true Americanism.

Assuring you of my high regard, I remain,

Sincerely,

(Signed) EDWARD KEATING,
Manager Plumb Plan League.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has left seven minutes.

Mr. SIMS. How much time has been consumed by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

The CHAIRMAN. Two hours and 32 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mine lacks 27 minutes of an hour and a half?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire that I shall yield the other hour to this side?

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman likes; yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour, or so much of it as may be desired, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate, as I am sure you do, the impossibility and the difficulty connected with the effort of any man to discuss this measure in detail in the space of one hour, and if there were no such difficulty confronting me I should be dissuaded from attempting to do it by the very excellent and admirable address delivered this morning by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the chairman of the committee, in which he gave an outline of the provisions of this bill and the reasons which have actuated the committee in its formation.

I desire to say that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has had this legislation under consideration since the 15th day of July. On that day the committee started the hearings which resulted in the framing of this bill. Those hearings were continued all through the latter part of July, all through August, and all through the month of September, comprising nearly two and one-half months, during which time nearly everybody in the United States representing the railroads, representing the railroad employees, and various commercial, agricultural, and other organizations throughout the country were permitted to appear before the committee and offer any solution that they had of the railroad problem.

At the outset it was recognized by the committee, as it has been recognized by everybody, that the railroads which were taken over by the President during the war could not be turned back to their private owners without remedial legislation. I think everybody who has had anything to do with railroad legislation or railroad operation, or who is at all familiar with the condition of the railroads and the country, will admit that it would be disastrous to the country, because disastrous to the railroads, to return the railroads to their owners under the same laws and conditions which prevailed prior to their being taken over by the Government. Therefore the committee started out in the beginning with the recognition of the fact that it would not be possible under present conditions to return the railroads to their owners without making not only provision for temporary relief to be granted to them, and temporary arrangements that might be entered into between them and the Government, but that, if the committee should present a bill that would give a broad and comprehensive treatment to the transportation problem, it was necessary to revamp the entire laws on the subject which had heretofore been in operation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has outlined the various plans which were presented to the committee, and I shall not undertake to cover that ground which he has already gone over so well. One of the first problems that the committee had to determine was the relationship that should exist between the railroads and the Government after their return to their owners, and how far the committee and Congress might be justified in extending the power of the Federal Government over the regulation of railroads or over their control and operation after their return.

The committee has framed this legislation upon the theory, without regard to the possibilities that lie out in the distant future, but recognizing the situation only as it presents itself now—the committee has framed this bill upon the theory that the roads would be returned at the end of this year, as announced by the President, and that the people desired them to be returned under conditions somewhat different from those which existed prior to the time when they were taken over by the Government. So far as I am individually concerned, at the outset I was somewhat impressed with the view presented by the former Director General of Railroads, Mr. McAdoo, and by his successor, Mr. Hines, during the last Congress, when they submitted a proposition that Federal control should be continued for a while in order that we might gain better information with reference to the final disposition of the railroad question. But it has been apparent to me, as I think it has been to every Member of this House, that Congress has not been disposed to adopt that suggestion. There have been certain inconveniences of operation and management, certain little details which had crept into the matter of Federal control and operation, which had not rested very lightly upon the sensibilities of a great many people, and there was a sort of impatience on the part of the public to unload the roads back onto their owners in order that the public and the Government might get rid of the burden as soon as possible.

So, recognizing what appears to be the overwhelming sentiment of the country at present, the committee, without regard to politics, applied themselves assiduously to the solution of the problems presented. I desire to say that there has not been a single political division in the committee or in the subcommittee on any proposal that has been considered in connection with this legislation. The committee from the very beginning has handled this legislation in a purely nonpartisan spirit. Anybody observing the conduct of the committee would have been unable to discern whether the members were Democrats or Republicans or which party was in the majority, so far as the action of the committee has been concerned, and I trust that in the consideration of this bill until it shall have been finally enacted the Members of the House, as I am sure they will, will consider this measure in the same nonpartisan spirit which has actuated the committee bringing it here for your consideration. [Applause.]

It is not a partisan question. There can not by the most imaginative flight be brought into the consideration of this measure anything that may be either to the advantage or disadvantage of one political party or another, and I am sure that this House will consider the measure purely from the standpoint of the welfare of the country, because that is the spirit in which we are seeking to deal with the transportation problem.

Now, I am sure that in the minds of many Members there is a question or query with reference to the reason why this bill proposes certain things with respect to the roads. When we decided to turn them back, and after the President in May issued the very cryptic statement that he intended to turn them back on the 1st of January, the House first began to realize the necessity of preparing this legislation for enactment before that time, because unless this or some other measure shall become a law as permanent legislation before the President returns the roads at the end of this calendar year, it will be necessary for the Congress to pass some sort of temporary legislation, or if that is not done the President will have to postpone the returning of the roads, because it is inconceivable to me that the President will feel justified in returning the railroads to their owners under present conditions without some kind of legislation providing for the transition period that will exist between their return to their owners and the readjustment of railroad conditions which must take place in the near future. One of the great problems presented to the committee and to the railroads, and which presents itself to this House, is the question of railroad credit, and that has been the burden of the song of the railroads before the committees from the very beginning of the consideration of this legislation. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] very forcibly outlined this morning, the railroads, even before the Government took them over, were complaining of the fact that they had lost their credit, and at the time the Government took the roads over and began to operate them in 1917 it was generally admitted by the railroad officials themselves that it was a good thing for the roads that the Government did take them over, because they were unable to finance themselves; they were unable to obtain that credit which is necessary in order to pay their fixed charges and make necessary expenditures for enlargements and betterments and additions. Of course, if that condition existed prior to the operation of the roads by the Government to any degree it would obtain very much more extensively with reference to the credit of the roads after they had been turned back from Government operation, unless there is some legislation that will enable either the Government or the roads themselves to bridge over this chasm that is supposed to extend between the return of the roads to their owners and the proper readjustment of the rates and transportation conditions.

So, in order that we may take care of that situation, and recognizing the fact that during Government operation the expenditures of the roads have increased to a larger extent than their revenues have increased, the question has arisen in the minds of the committee, and especially in the minds of those who were charged with attempting to adjust the financial arrangements between the Government and the roads, as to what is the moral obligation or the legal obligation of the Government, in view of the fact that these expenditures have been brought about not necessarily by reason of Government operation but during the continuation of Government operation.

It is a well-known fact that the Government of the United States lost during the two years of Government operation and control, beginning January 1, 1918, and ending December 31, 1919, something like $625,000,000. Over and above receipts which have come in during the two-year period, in addition to the standard return amounting to $936,000,000 a year, the loss of the Federal Government will be a little over $600,000,000. We must wipe that amount off the books as a war cost. There is no way in which the Government can ever recover, because under the Federal-control act the Government obligated itself, and it has been carried out for the most part under contracts with the roads, that they should receive the standard return fixed in the law. Some of the roads have not entered into that contract with the Government, and those roads may have their remedy in the Court of Claims, but under the Federal-control act that was provided for. So we may dismiss that from consideration.

During Federal control the President increased the freight rates about 25 per cent and the passenger rates about 50 per cent. We recognize the fact that during the two years of the war the cost of the material which went into construction and reconstruction and extension and betterments of roads increased all the way from 50 per cent to more than 100 per cent. I think it may be conservatively stated that the increase in the cost of material during the two-year period while the Government has had control of the roads has been somewhere between 60 and 75 per cent.

In addition to that, the Director General has increased the rates of pay of railway employees. It is idle to say that those wages would not have been increased if the Government had never taken over the roads. Everybody recognizes the fact that whether the Government took over the roads or did not take them over, the laboring men who worked for these transportation companies were demanding and were entitled to a large increase in their wages.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Can the gentleman give us the amount of the increase in round numbers in dollars and cents?

Mr. BARKLEY. I may be mistaken about the figures, but my understanding is that, exclusive of the recent increase granted by the Director General, which was to date back to May of this year, for certain shop employees and others, which amounted to about $45,000,000, the total increase in wages during the two-year period has amounted to something in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 a year, which would, of course, in the two-year period amount to about $2,000,000,000 increase of wages over and above the wages they were drawing and would have drawn but for these increases. Of course, you must take into consideration the fact that by reason of the operation of the eight-hour law, which went into effect just before the Government took over these roads, and by reason of the fact that employees who theretofore had done more than eight hours' work could not do as much work in the eight hours as they had formerly done in longer hours, there was necessitated an increase in the number of employees over and above those who were necessary under the old law. Taking into consideration the increases that have been made, I think I am conservatively correct in saying that there has been an increase of about 140,000 persons in the number of employees of railroads during the two years.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Can the gentleman state the percentage of increase in this period over the wages received prior to the Federal-control act?

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not give it to you definitely, because the increases for different classes of employees are different, and have been worked out upon such a scale of detail that it is very difficult to get the percentage for each class of employees, but my recollection is that the total increases which have been made during the two years aggregate a little more than 40 per cent.

Now, we are confronted with this situation: Nobody who is in his right mind believes that these employees will consent or that they ought to be compelled to consent to a reduction of the wages granted them by the Federal Government. Certainly they can not undergo such a reduction until there has been a proportionate reduction in the cost of living. I think it may be fairly said that with the large increases that have been made by the Federal Government in the expenditure for employees alone, notwithstanding the increase, the increase has not kept pace with the cost of living. While the increase of wages on the average may in some individual case be too large and it may be in an individual class of employees, the increases have not been larger than the increase of the cost of living. It is generally admitted that during the last two or three years the increase of cost of living to the average family of American people has been about 82 per cent, whereas the increase of salary and wages of railroad employees has been between 40 and 50 per cent. So I think it is fair to assume that there could be no substantial reduction in wages of the railroad labor within the next few months or few years.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. SEARS. Is it not a fact that in a certain class of railroad employees, like the depot agent and the telegraph operator, their wages have not been increased, except a few months ago, when there was a small increase given?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true; they did not have a wage increase until a few months ago, and I think it is true that their increase is not in proportion to the increase granted some other employees.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Have the wages of the railroad employees been increased in proportion to wages in private industry?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether I can answer that question or not, because I do not have with me the figures with reference to all classes. But I should say, taking the situation as a whole—and I am only able to state in a general way from general information, because the committee has been so thoroughly engrossed in the consideration of railroad legislation since the middle of July that we have not had an opportunity to investigate scales that are being paid in other private industries, but in a general way I think the gentleman is correct—that the increases on the average of railroad employees have not kept pace with or at least have not exceeded the increases granted in very many private enterprises.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. HASTINGS. As to the wages of the different classes of railroad employees, I wonder if the gentleman could give us the average wage now paid?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it would be very difficult to get the average amount paid per month or year of all railroad employees, and if you get the average it would be an unfair basis to judge a proper and reasonable wage received. The gentleman will understand that there is a wider field of difference in the various classes of railroad employees than exists in any other line of industry in the United States.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. SEARS. I do not know about the average wage, but the wage of an operator under a $6,000 bond in a town of 5,000 or 6,000 inhabitants up to three months ago was $98 a month. This man had to receive all train orders, and yet he only received $98 a month.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. OLNEY. Is it not a fact that the increases in freight and passenger rates have not been commensurate with the increase in wages and cost of material, and would not that be a question to be considered in the future by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what I was leading up to when I began the discussion of the increase of wages for the laboring men on the roads. The increase of wages, as I have stated, has been between 40 and 50 per cent—I think nearer 40 than 50. But the increase in freight rates has been only 25 per cent and the increase in passenger rates approximately 50 per cent. You will understand, however, that very few roads make any great profit out of the passanger traffic; the great income comes from shipment of freight and not by reason of the passenger traffic. So I think on the whole it may be said that the actual increase in the revenue of the roads for the two-year period is limited to 25 per cent over their former rates.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. For a brief question.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I understand the gentleman to say that there has been an increase in the railroad employees of 250,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. One hundred and forty thousand.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That was due largely to the transportation of troops during the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; partly to that; but under the eight-hour law they had to have more employees.

Mr. HUDSPETH. How many additional employees could be cut off in these times?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think but very few of them. The testimony of the railroad brotherhoods, and of the executives of the railroads themselves, was that there might be a little economy by laying off a man here and there, but taking the whole 140,000 there would be very little opportunity to decrease the number of employees so as to have any appreciable effect on the expenditures of the roads.

Now, all this has transpired under Government control. We can not speculate about what would have happened if the Government had not taken over the roads. As I said a moment ago, I think it fair to assume that the wages of labor would have increased, even if the roads had not been taken over.

I think it is also fair to assume that the rates charged for hauling freight and passengers would have increased if the roads had not been taken over. Whether there would have been a nearer approximation to the proportion of increases of expenditures to revenues if the roads had not been taken over no one can answer, because that is a matter purely in the realm of speculation. Here we have a situation where, through the operation of the Government and by direction of the President and the Director General, the expenditures of the roads have increased more than the revenues have increased, notwithstanding the fact that everyone has recognized and the committee has recognized and the Railroad Administration has recognized that if the present proportion of expenditures and income should continue the Government itself will be compelled to increase the rates. Nearly everyone in the United States expected two or three months ago that there would be an increase in the rates, in order that the deficit that was piling up against the Government every month, by reason of the operation of the roads, might be either decreased or entirely obliterated; but the Director General announced that in view of the proximity of the time when the President would return the roads to private control he did not feel justified in increasing the rates, and he made that announcement almost simultaneously with the announcement of an increase in the wages of shop and other employees, which amounts to about $45,000,000 a year and which would date back to May of this year. So that we will turn the roads back to their owners with an increased expense account and with a decreased proportional revenue. There was a little surplus in the Government operation during the month of July of about $2,000,000. There was another small surplus during the month of August, but that surplus was calculated without taking into consideration the $45,000,000 increase in wages, and when the $45,000,000 is put back to May 1 of this year, and divided into 12 parts, it more than wipes out the little surplus of $2,000,000 that was in the Treasury during the month of July as a result of the operation of the roads.

Turning back the roads with an increase of expenditures out of proportion to the increase of revenues, whether brought about by reason of Government control or not, confronted the committee with this situation: Waiving the question of any legal obligation that we might be under to the roads by reason of this difference in the cost of operation and income, which has been brought about by Government order, is there not a moral obligation resting upon the Government to turn them back either under conditions that will enable them to make the same proportionate income to outgo which obtained before the Government took the roads over; or, in the absence of that, is it not our duty to provide some means of bridging the roads over this chasm until the regular processes of the law have an opportunity to work and bring about a readjustment of rates that will meet the situation which confronts the roads when they are turned over?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there not another element to be considered here? What about the condition of the roads in respect to deterioration as to rolling stock and roadbeds?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Government in the Federal-control act obligates itself to turn the roads back to their owners in as good condition as when the Government took them over.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman taken into consideration what amount that would require?

Mr. BARKLEY. I would say to the gentleman I think it is fair to say that the Government will turn the roads back in practically as good physical condition as they were when they were taken over. I am speaking now of the financial end of it. I think the testimony of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the railway operators themselves is that, with few exceptions—of course, you can not have exact perfect conditions at any given time—taking the roads as a whole, they will be turned back to their owners in practically as good condition, physically, as they were when taken over, but there may be a very decided difference so far as their financial situation is concerned, and that is what I am addressing myself to now.

There are three ways by which we undertake in this bill for the Government to carry out its moral obligation, because our legal obligation ends when we turn the roads back in as good physical condition as they were when they were taken over; but in order that the Government may not be charged with having neglected even its moral obligations to these roads we provide three ways by which this period may be cared for while regular processes of the law are being put into operation to readjust rates and expenditures according to the needs of the roads. In the first place, we provide that the standard return which we have been paying the roads during the last two years shall be continued to them for a period of six months after the Government control ceases, and that a test period of three years ending June 30, 1917, and the corresponding six months of each one of those years is to be taken as an average, and that average is to be applied to the first six months after the roads are turned back to their owners. Of course that is purely an arbitrary figure that the committee has adopted, and it can not be otherwise than an arbitrary figure. Some standard must be set up. If the Government is to guarantee these roads any particular returns during the transition period, as we call it, there must necessarily be an arbitrary figure, and we have taken the figure which was put in the Federal-control act covering the compensation of the roads by the Government during the period of Federal control. I think that is a fair figure, although it is arbitrary, if there is to be any guaranty of the return. If the Interstate Commerce Commission was equipped to put into effect on the first day that the Government control ceases a scale of rates that would be sufficient to pay expenses of the roads and enable them to meet their fixed charges and other obligations that they have incurred or will incur, there would be no necessity for this six months' guaranty. This guaranty was put into the bill only because the testimony of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself showed that it would take at least six months for them to adjust the rates and schedules and classifications applicable to these rates, in order that the items of expense and income might more nearly approximate each other.

Then we provided also that the present rates fixed by the Director General, which will be in effect when the Federal control terminates, shall become the legal rates until otherwise changed by operation of law, which means, of course, until the various State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission can go through the necessary routine of having the schedules filed with them and make their investigations to determine whether or not the increases applied for by the roads ought to be granted. Now, we make it a condition that before any road under Federal control shall be permitted to enjoy the benefits of this six months' guaranty it must give evidence of its need of it by filing a schedule of the increases of rates. Upon first blush, on reading that sentence, casual observation might lead one to believe it was mandatory that the road should immediately file a schedule of increases of rates. But that is not the object of it and that will not be the effect. That merely is evidence of the fact that the railroad needs the guaranty. It amounts to a guaranty for those who do need these increases of rates; but in order to show that a road needs this increase of rates and this guaranty it must, within 60 days after the turning back to private owners, file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule of increases of rates, and if it does not do that it is not permitted to increase the rates, and if it does not need it it does not need the guaranty, and therefore will not receive it. Now, these are two ways in which we have attempted to bridge over the transition period of six months that will be necessary, according to the commission itself and according to all the State commissions, in order that the rates may be readjusted throughout the United States. We do one other thing. We provide that the railroads under certain conditions shall be permitted to borrow money from the Federal Government at any time within two years to run for a period of not exceeding five years, and in order that they may borrow this money they must make application to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They must state the amount of the loan, they must state the purposes for which it is intended to be expended, the character of the security that will be offered to secure the Government against loss, and then the commission, after considering all these things, makes its report and recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is finally to determine the question as to whether the amount shall be advanced and the kind of security, the commission only making its recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury after a full investigation of the application made by the roads. So that the committee, after consideration, not in order that the railroads may be guaranteed against loss that other men in their industries might sustain, but in order that the Government might be sure to have performed to the last iota all of its obligation to the roads, both legal and moral, we simply provide that they may be financed and that necessary credit may be accorded to them during the six months necessary for the commission itself to adjust rates so it will bring about the necessary revenue. I think it is fair to say—we need not keep back anything—that the Interstate Commerce Commission recognizes the fact that on the whole there must be an increase of the rates in the United States. Either that or there must be a decrease in wages or a decrease in the other expenditures, cost of materials, and other things going into the operation of the roads. Now, nobody believes that wages ought to be decreased; nobody believes that the cost of material will be decreased except as a result of the natural processes of readjustment after the war, so we did not feel justified in hoping that there would be any material reduction in the cost of operating these roads in the next few months or in the next few years, and, recognizing that situation, we have undertaken to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission full authority, and at the same time, with the necessary safeguards to the interests of the people and the shippers and the consumers of the United States, we have clothed the commission with full authority to take into account the entire railroad transportation situation as to the rates after the roads are turned back to their owners—have clothed them with full power and authority to meet and deal with the necessities which may exist. Now, there is the guaranty for six months, there is the continuation of the present rate for six months, and there is the power to borrow money from the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the gentleman believe there will be a more economical operation of the roads under private management than there has been under Government operation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, I do not know that my belief will be worth anything, but I presume that now and then some employee who felt that he was working for the Government and not for private employers may have been a little more slack by reason of Government operation than he would have been under private operation. That might have been true in isolated cases, but taking the employees as a whole, I doubt very seriously if there will be any appreciable increase in the economic operations so far as labor is concerned. I believe the employees of the roads on the whole have been just as willing and zealous during Government operation as they were before the Government took over the roads. In some isolated cases, I say, there may have been men who laid down on the job. But taking the two and a half millions as a whole, I am unable to say that they have deliberately neglected their duty while under Government control to cause delay or make some trouble to the Government because it was operating the roads during the war. Of course, the gentleman will recognize the fact that during the war hundreds of thousands of railroad employees were taken out of the service. The railroad service was to some extent demoralized, because the Army took many of their employees and they were compelled to take on new employees to take their places, and in that way there was more or less loss of energy and time.

Mr. TILLMAN. What prompted me to ask the question was that it often has been asserted that private individuals could conduct the Post Office Department, for instance, at very much less expense than the Government conducts it. I wanted to get the gentleman's opinion of whether or not he believed that private individuals could conduct the railroad systems better than the Government could.

Mr. BARKLEY. They might do this; they might drive their employees harder and get more work out of them, or some of them, in a day, but on the whole I doubt very seriously whether there can be any economies practiced in the labor situation when the roads are turned back to their owners.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. ALMON. Did not the committee in considering the right or a provision for a loan take into consideration that it would be in the interest of the public to prevent failure and receivership?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that was the moving cause.

Mr. ALMON. You refer to the fact that it was a moral obligation in addition to the one suggested?

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggested at the outset that it would have been disastrous to turn the roads back to the owners without necessary remedial legislation. I think it is not going too far to say that if we on the 31st of December were to turn the roads back to their owners without remedial legislation, it would result in the most disastrous financial panic that this country has ever seen.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The bill now provides that a six months' guaranty shall be given or furnished to such roads as make application. Will it not be the effect that those roads that are not earning as much as the normal returns would make the application and those that are earning more would not make the application for this guaranty?

Mr. BARKLEY. That might be the result. If a road is earning more money than it had been earning or is earning sufficient money to pay all of its expenses and provide a fair return, as they thought, on the value of their property, there would be no reason for making the application. And there would be no reason in that case for an increase of rate.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Then what would you say as to the justness of the Government taking from those roads that earned in excess of the standard returns to compensate itself to pay railroads that earned less?

Mr. BARKLEY. Our bill does not provide that.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I know it does not; but what is your opinion on that?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think the Government has any legal right to take money out of the treasury of a prosperous road and give it to one that is not prosperous, and I doubt seriously if, under the Constitution, we have the power to do that. We might take it for taxes and put it into the Federal Treasury under the power of taxation, and expend it in any way the Government might see fit as a part of the general revenues of the Government, but I very seriously doubt the power of Congress to penalize a prosperous road by taking all over a certain per cent and giving it to a road that does not make anything, aside from the moral question that enters into the equation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the gentleman's intention to discuss the short-line feature of the bill in his remarks?

Mr. BARKLEY. If I get the time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unfortunately I did not hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] on that feature.

Mr. BARKLEY. My understanding is that when the Government took over the roads they took over a lot more than they intended to. They sent a blank order that was served on all the roads from a list furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The result was that they took over about seventeen hundred little roads that they did not need, and they turned them back just prior to the 1st of July. Now, those were largely made up of short-line roads. They have insistently contended, and they have with a good deal of force contended, although they were taken over and were turned back almost immediately, that the operation of Federal control over the big roads was to their disadvantage in this respect, that they have been compelled to pay the same rate of wages to their employees as the wages fixed by the Federal Government on the roads under Federal control. And the reason they were compelled to do that was because they had to meet the scale of wages paid on the other roads or lose their employees. And there is a great deal of force in that contention. They also claim that traffic has been diverted from these smaller roads by reason of the Government desiring to send freight over the most direct routes, and in many cases freight has been diverted from the small to the trunk-line roads, and their earnings have thereby been cut down. We provide in this bill that the guaranty shall apply to the roads thus situated, just as it has to the roads that were operated by the Government during the period of Federal control.

And we provide also in connection with these roads that the guaranty and division of rates shall apply just as it does on other roads. Of course, you realize the fact that we could not go the whole length that the short-line roads desire. But we have given to them the right of this guaranty which we give to the larger roads, for the period of six months, and the right to borrow money, and in the meantime various State commissions and the Federal commissions will have opportunity to readjust their rates just as they do the rates of the larger roads.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any provision for the extension of credits of the short-line railroads?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. I think there is provision in certain cases where they may be given credit, if they are subject to the commerce act.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the bill provide in the event the road earns more than a reasonable return on its investment, say 6 per cent, it may retain all the excess earnings regardless of the amount of earnings?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no provision in this bill limiting the earnings of any railroad to any particular per cent. We assume that a road that is making more than 6 per cent, or making 6 per cent, will not need the guaranty. And certainly if it made the application for that and investigation developed the fact that the road was making all of its expenses and a return of 6 per cent the Interstate Commerce Commission would not be justified in recommending to the Secretary of the Treasury that any money be advanced to that kind of a road.

Now, we provide, in addition to the standard return to these roads, where they make an earning over and above the standard return, they, of course, keep it, but when there is no return during the test period we provide that the amount of the guaranty shall be an amount whereby the deficit for the next six months exceeds that for the test period prior to the war. In other words, we pay back to them the amount they have lost by reason of the Government operation during the six months.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The Cummins bill, I understand——

Mr. BARKLEY. That bill provides for a guaranty of return of 5½ per cent on the roads and one-half of 1 per cent for insurance and other things.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. All excess earnings to be collected and covered into the Treasury?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. And then paid out to roads that do not make that much.

Now, I desire to discuss the other features of the bill. How long have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TIMBERLAKE). The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are two features of this bill that I object to. They were not in the bill as framed by the subcommittee. They were put in by the full committee. I desire to discuss them, and I shall offer amendments later on to cover them.

Heretofore there has never been any statutory rule of rate making. The rule of rate making which the Interstate Commerce Commission has always been guided by is that the rate shall be reasonable and just. In the first process of framing this bill the subcommittee felt that that rule still ought to apply, because it had been interpreted time and time again by the commission and had been interpreted by the Supreme Court in innumerable decisions, so that as the result of the operation of the interstate-commerce act since 1887 there has been built up around the rate-making clause a line of decisions by the commission itself and by the courts which governed the commission in the fixing of rates. But the committee wrote into the bill a provision of this sort:

The commission shall be charged with the duty and responsibility of observing and keeping informed as to the transportation needs and the transportation facilities and service of the country, and as to the operating revenues necessary to the adequacy and efficiency of such transportation facilities and service. In reaching its conclusions as to the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, the commission shall take into consideration the interest of the public, the shippers, the reasonable cost of maintenance and operation (including the wages of labor, depreciation, and taxes), and a fair return upon the value of the property used or held for the service of transportation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What part of the bill is that found in?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is section 417 of the bill, page 65.

Now, my objection is, in the first place, that I think it is very unwise, as the chairman of the committee himself suggested this morning, to write into the law a statutory rule of rate making, because there are so many elements that go into the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the reasonableness and justness of any rate proposed by a railroad that it is practically impossible to write into the rule all the things that will enter into the equation. For instance, there are many roads in this country which have never earned any return on the value of their property, and the reason why they have never earned anything is because, in the first place, many of them were injudiciously constructed; many of them ought never to have been built. If wise foresight and business judgment had entered into the reasons that prompted their construction, they would not have been constructed. In the next place, many of the roads have been very uneconomically and inefficiently managed, and by reason of such uneconomical and inefficient management and operation they have been unable to earn any return on the value of their property.

Now, I am very much afraid that the language which the committee has written into the bill, compelling the Interstate Commerce Commission to take into consideration the entire expense of running the road, and on top of that to bring about such a rate as will give to the road a fair return upon the value of its property, may compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates at such a high level that roads that heretofore have never earned a dollar on the value of their property may receive such rates as will bring a return to them, regardless of the character of the management, whether economically and efficiently or otherwise managed and operated; and therefore I believe it would be better to leave out of the law entirely any statutory rule for making rates, leaving it to the commission to see that all rates, fares, and charges shall be just and reasonable, and allowing them to take into consideration every element in the management and operation of the road to determine whether it is entitled to a fair return upon the value of its property. But if this language shall remain in the bill, certainly it ought to be amended so as affirmatively to give the commission the right and to charge it with the duty of considering at the same time whether the property has been economically and efficiently managed, so that they may survey the whole field upon the application of any carrier for an increase of rates.

Another thing that I object to is a provision in the bill with reference to the funding of the debts due the Government from the roads.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. In a moment. Can I get a few moments more time? Well, I will yield to the gentleman, anyway.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like the gentleman to explain the meaning of the phrase "value of the property." Does it mean market value or value in transportation and use?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, of course, we have now in operation and process of making a valuation of the railroads of the United States. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been engaged in the last two or three years in fixing a valuation of the physical property of the railroads. That valuation has not been completed, and I assume it will be two or three years before that valuation shall have been completed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If that valuation had been made there might be some basis upon which to fix the value, and, of course, that would be the valuation of the roads as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. But until that valuation is completed and the commission makes its report I am unable even to imagine a valuation that the commission may fix upon the property in ascertaining a fair return, and I may say that perhaps the commission would be compelled to take the valuation as represented by the roads themselves—the book valuation of the roads that make the application for the increase of rates.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The railroads have insisted upon having their property valued for business and other purposes similar to the adjacent property. Others have insisted that it shall be the value for transportation purposes. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission reached any conclusion on that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. There has been no final conclusion with reference to the valuation of the property. There is a subcommittee, as the gentleman knows, now at work on this valuation, and the estimate is that it will be three years before that is completed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. So that in adopting this language you do not know what it means?

Mr. BARKLEY. You do not.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Would it be possible in all cases to give a net revenue on some roads?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it would be necessary to raise the rates so high on the unprosperous roads that the prosperous roads that did not need the higher rate would get all the business.

Mr. PLATT. That is the point, that higher rates may mean less net revenue.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Take two roads which compete in the same territory. One of them is well managed and economically operated, and it gets a fair return on its property. It may not need this guaranty. It may be it can already make a fair return. The other road is not very well managed. It may be that its operators have been speculating with it a little on the money market and it has made no return of any kind on the value of the property. It makes application to the commission for an increase of rate that will enable it to get a fair return on the value of its property. The other road does not make the application. Suppose the commission grants the increase. It would not do the road any good at all, because its rates would be so high in order to guarantee it a return that the business would all go to the other road with the cheaper rate. Therefore you might have one road with one rate and another with another, and the result would be that the traffic would go where the cheapest rates prevailed. So even a small, unprosperous road would derive no benefit by reason of this provision.

The other thing to which I object is the provision for the funding of the debt. When the roads are turned back to private ownership the Government will owe the roads a certain amount of money for compensation under the standard return, and the roads will owe the Government a certain amount of money that has been advanced by the Government to the roads for the purpose of making additions, betterments, and extensions. Under the bill as originally drawn, it provided that these two accounts should be offset one against the other. In other words, the amount that the Government owed the roads for compensation should be set off against the amount that the roads owe the Government, and the roads permitted to fund the difference, the balance that the roads owe the Government over and above what the Government owes the roads. I think everybody will admit that that is good business. If I owe you $100 and you owe me $200, and we decide that we are not going to do business together any longer and we begin to square accounts, you need not pay me the $200 you owe me, but you can pay me the difference—the $100 over and above what I owe you. In other words, we would square our accounts, and you pay me the $100 that you owe me over and above what I owe you. It seems to me that same rule ought to be applied to the railroads. When these roads are turned back to their owners, the Government will owe them perhaps nearly $1,000,000,000. At present I think it is about $800,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I have 15 minutes more?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky 15 minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. The roads have been advanced by the Government during Federal control about $1,250,000,000 in order to enable them to make additions and betterments in their equipment and in their tracks, and in order to meet certain fixed charges which it was necessary that they should meet during Federal control. Under the standard contract which has been entered into between the Government and these roads some of these obligations extend over a period of 10 years or longer. It depends entirely on the contract made between the roads and the Government. We, of course, do not propose to violate that obligation. We do not propose to compel them to violate the contract they have made with the Government, but certainly if the roads owe the Government $1,250,000,000 when they are turned back, and the Government owes them $800,000,000, or whatever the amount may be, those two accounts ought to be offset the one against the other and allow the roads to fund the difference that they owe the Government, even if after they do it they have to make application immediately for the borrowing of new funds from the Government, because in that way you wipe the slate clean of the Federal-control transaction. You square accounts, and I would rather the roads would be compelled to offset their accounts against the Government and square the account of Federal control, even if the next day they have to come back to the Government and borrow some money on a new account made under the provisions of the bill, under which they can borrow this money for five years at 6 per cent if the Interstate Commerce Commission permits it to be done. Now, under the present language of the bill a road that may not need to fund its debt, a road that may have enough money to pay its obligations to the Government and not borrow any, can fund its debt to the Government for 10 years. If the road does not need it, it ought not to be given an opportunity so to fund its debt, and the Railroad Administration ought to be given the power in such cases to compel the road to offset its debt to the Government against the debt that the Government owes it, and fund the difference, if there is any, between those accounts.

At the proper time I hope to offer an amendment that will care for that situation.

Now, I desire briefly to discuss the labor provisions of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. It would be very interesting to know the argument that was used before the committee which induced the committee to report what it did report. What was the argument that was used? I am impressed with the fairness of what the gentleman says. Why not offset one account against the other?

Mr. BARKLEY. The argument that was used was this: It was represented that of course these advances that have been made by the Government during Federal control, which are chargeable to capital account, have gone into additions and betterments. Now, ordinarily the railroads under private control and management borrowed the money necessary to make these additions in betterments on long-time paper—5, 10, 15, or 20 years, as the case might be. The contention made by those who favored the provision of the bill was that if we compel the roads to offset their indebtedness against the Government, it will compel them practically to pay cash for these additions in betterments which otherwise they might have obtained by borrowing money from private sources upon long-time paper. That was the argument that was made by those who favored the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will you kindly state the amount due from the roads to the Government and the amount due from the Government to the roads?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Government, according to the report, has advanced to the railroads $775,551,000. That is exclusive of the allocated equipment, where the Government bought a lot of equipment and allocated it among the different roads and charged them with it. On the 24th of last month the amount that the Government owed the roads as compensation amounted to $885,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. For a question.

Mr. DENISON. I know the gentleman wants to make a correct statement, and I think the gentleman has made an unintentional misstatement as to the amount.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. DENISON. The total amount that the Government has advanced to all the railroads during the period of Government control is $1,147,151,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but I have subtracted from that the amount expended for new equipment, which is not to be funded.

Mr. DENISON. From that amount $372,000,000 is to be taken care of by means of the equipment car trust, which is now pending before the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. That would leave $775,551,000 as the capital-expenditure amount.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what I am talking about—the amount to be funded is $775,551,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire in the time I have remaining to take up the labor provisions in the bill. I wish I had time to discuss them in detail. I recognize the fact that there is an insistent demand in certain quarters that Congress should pass legislation incorporating compulsory arbitration in railroad disputes among the employees in the United States and the railroad transportation companies, and that in addition to that we should penalize the strike that is called or entered into by the railroad employees.

In the first place, if there is to be any antistrike legislation in the United States, or any penalizing, or any compulsory arbitration, by which I mean a law that will compel men to go before an arbitration or mediation board, and after they have gone before it to compel them to obey its awards, or penalize the strike on their part, it certainly ought to be made to apply to all the employees in the United States. If there is to be any such legislation, it should apply to all.

So far as I am concerned, I am not convinced that it is wise or practicable to enact such legislation for the employees of the United States as a whole. I wish during the time I have I could go into detail with reference to legislation of this character in every country in the world. There has been in some countries antistrike legislation, and there is no country in the world to-day where antistrike legislation was ever enacted where it was enforced except by draft into the military service of men who went out on a strike and penalizing them for violating their oath as a member of the military establishment. Take Italy, France, and Spain, countries of Europe; wherever they have had legislation for compulsory arbitration and antistrike legislation they have never been able to enforce it except at the point of the bayonet. I am not prepared to vote for a law in the United States that will draft into the Military Establishment of our country men who go on a strike as a remedy against conditions, where they have a grievance, and I do not think the people of this country would indorse any such legislation.

They have a law in Canada known as "the industrial disputes investigation act." There have been about 191 cases, I suppose, altogether, submitted to that tribunal set up by the Canadian act. Out of those 191 cases submitted to that Canadian tribunal there have been 20 strikes among the employees in Canada, notwithstanding the law. Six of them were railroad strikes.

Now, men may inveigh against violation of law by great bodies of men, and yet we are confronted by a practical situation. The law against strikes and providing compulsory arbitration in no country has ever been able to be enforced. Great Britain sent a commission to Canada in 1916 to investigate the working of the Canadian act. The Department of Labor has issued a bulletin of 150 pages giving the operation of the Canadian act up to 1918, and the report of the commissioner shows that while the act itself has been in force since 1907, it has not prevented strikes and has not even reduced strikes.

Now, I think it is fair to say that the railroad employees of the United States are among the highest class of employees in our country. I think on the whole they are just as jealous of their honor, just as patriotic, just as loyal, as the average man, because the railroad employees of the United States come from the firesides of the average family among the American population. I think in intelligence, patriotism, loyalty, integrity they will measure up well with any other class of men in the United States. I do not think there is any class that excels the railroad employees in the average of character and intelligence.

There has never been any serious trouble on the railroads of the United States by lack of compulsory arbitration or antistrike legislation. The first difficulty was immediately prior to the Adamson Act. There have been numerous demands on the part of labor for an increase in wage, and during the Government operation of roads these demands have been in practically every case met by the Railroad Administration, recognizing the justice, at least in part, of the demand the men have made.

There have been established in the Railroad Administration boards of arbitration to pass on wages and conditions of labor, and the representatives of labor and of the Railroad Administration have gotten together around the table, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—and I believe I am justified in saying a hundred cases out of a hundred—where the men have gotten together around the table they have been able to settle their troubles without serious difficulty. We are passing through a very critical period, through a period when not alone laboring men are the ones who are agitated. Laboring men are excited, but everyone else is excited. Business is excited, politicians are excited. Everybody in the United States is more or less in a state of confusion, and now, because of this state of confusion and chaos, as a result of the reorganization and reconstruction of our economic system because of the results of the war, there are labor disputes and troubles throughout the country. But these are only temporary. They are transitory. I have great faith in the belief that when the war is ended and the period of reconstruction and transition is passed, labor and capital, industry, and everyone else will get on a normal basis, and we will be able to readjust our national life along the lines we followed during our previous history before the war. [Applause.] I sincerely hope Congress will not be swept off its feet into rushing through legislation that will be unwise economically and impractical from every standpoint, because we now happen to be in a temporary state of mental excitement and agitation because of disputes that are now in progress. In time it will all iron itself out and simmer down to a normal condition.

I think we have provided in this bill a fair tribunal, where men can go voluntarily, and not by the spur and whip, to settle their troubles; where laboring men and men who employ them can, under the supervision of a tribunal which we have set up here, made up equally of employees and employers, compose their difficulties. There is an advisory board of three representing the public, but they have no voice in the determination of the difficulties. The effort of this bill is to make it easy for the men and the roads to compose their own differences in a friendly way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. If we will exercise foresight, a little good judgment, and patience, as we ought to exercise it, if we set up a tribunal that will inspire confidence on both sides, I have an abiding faith that our industrial troubles, so far as they relate to railroads, may be adjusted and settled without the necessity of compelling men to go before boards or compelling them to continue in work after conditions have arisen which they feel justified in protesting against.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman mentioned an advisory board of three, I think, sitting in the appeal board?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman explain why they have not been given a voice in the decision to be arrived at by the board? It seems to me that these three, representing the public, should not only have the privilege of advising, but should also have some voice in the decision of that board.

Mr. BARKLEY. The reason why that was not done was this: What we are seeking to do here is to have the employees and employer get together and encourage them to settle their own difficulties by their own representatives. We thought that for the purpose of information and advice and publicity it was wise to have a commission of three representing the public, so called, on hand, to counsel with the others representing the employees and employer, but that when it came to a decision of the difficulties between the employer and the employees it ought to be left to the employer and the employees or their representatives, especially in view of the fact that we do not compel them to abide by any award made by the board.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Assuming that plan to be carried out, does not the gentleman think that there is grave possibility, or at least a possibility, of this appeals board not coming to a decision? The employee and the employer groups may disagree. Surely there is a moral advantage, if nothing else, in having announced in a decision, whether it be made compulsory or not, the viewpoint of the three public advisers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course there is a possibility of a deadlock between the three representatives of labor and the three representatives of the employers. There is always that possibility, but if there were very many cases of deadlocks, and the group representing the public took sides with one side or the other, ultimately there might be created a suspicion on the part of one or the other that they had not gotten a fair deal, and we felt that it was best to leave these difficulties to the parties to the dispute, even subject to a deadlock.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to say to my colleague on the committee that that was one of the great troubles in the steel strike. The steel manufacturers maintain that the men who came before them and wanted to negotiate the questions relative to the hours of labor and wages, and so forth, were not representatives of the men or did not work in the steel industry themselves; and this bill provides that these men shall be actual employees of the railroad and members of the management.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; so that difficulty is obviated.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has been discussing the wisdom of making strikes by railroad employees unlawful. Are we to understand the gentleman to say that he makes no distinction between railroad employees and employees of other public utilities and the employees of private industrial corporations?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not mean to say that I make no distinction between them, because there is a distinction to this extent: One of them is working for a quasi-public corporation and the other is engaged in a private industry, and therefore it may be said that the public has a greater interest in the continuation of transportation facilities than in the continuation of a private industry.

But so far as the principle is concerned, I can not see the difference between a railroad strike and strikes in any other great industry that may affect the public to great disadvantage. But so far as the principle is concerned, I do not believe, even conceding that antistrike legislation ought to be enacted—which I do not concede—that railroad employees, who are among the most patriotic and intelligent of our country, should be singled out for such action where other employees are not subject to provisions of this kind. [Applause.] It would not be fair or just to penalize one class of employees because they work for transportation companies that cover the whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, previous to my remarks I wish to pay a tribute to the chairman of our committee, who labored for weeks and months in order to report a bill releasing the railroads from Government control and at the same time provide for them under private ownership, that they may not only meet their financial obligations but give adequate service to the public. In this I believe Mr. ESCH was successful.

Under the powers of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the President of the United States "took possession and assumed control at 12 o'clock noon on December 30, 1917, of certain railroads, systems of transportation, including the railroads and transportation systems of the companies and the appurtenances thereof, and directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of transportation systems thus taken should be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, appointed Director General of the Railroads."

The President in a proclamation stated that it is his purpose to release Federal control of railroads on January 1, 1920. Thus the present bill has been reported for your immediate consideration.

The clause of the section that empowered the President to take possession and assume control of all the transportation systems of our country, contained only nine lines, but it necessitated a bill of 86 pages to release that control with the incidents thereto.

Previous to the war there was a growing sentiment in favor of nationalization of railroads, but after two years of forced trial of Government control, though under most unfavorable circumstances, the opinion of the public has materially changed to the contrary.

A number of plans were outlined to the committee favoring the Government guaranteeing the principle and interest of railroad bonds and stock under a readjustment. This measure is free from the tincture of state stewardship, save section 208, which appropriates the sum of $250,000,000 as a revolving fund for the purpose of making loans to railways as therein provided, thereby enabling them to facilitate their improvements to meet the needs of the public.

The mileage of the steam railroads of the world is 713,120 miles, of which 237,010 miles are owned or controlled by the several Governments.

The United States has in operation 257,700 miles, one-third of the railway mileage of the world.

I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD this table, showing the mileage owned or controlled by the various countries of the world.

When the Government assumed control of the railways, 62.3 per cent of the earnings of the carriers yielded dividends at an average rate of 6.81 per cent. To provide for the permanent termination of Federal control of railroads, in a way to enable them to earn their operating expenses and fixed charges, is a very difficult problem to solve.

I am opposed to Government ownership of railways, and favor Federal control only so far as legislation is needed for their proper management. It has been well established that employees of railways under Government ownership are less proficient; their individualism under restraint; and the absence of responsibility creates a stigmatism of character.

The freight charges per mile are less in the United States than in any other country save India, where the wages are very low. In Japan the rates of transportation are higher than in the United States, although the average compensation of railway employees is $116.96 per annum, while with us it is $825, in accordance with the table of 1914. The present average of the railway employees in the United States has been increased to $1,200 per annum.

A noted example of the inefficiency of Government operation was demonstrated after the French Government purchased the Western Railway. The company filed with the director of finance an application for additional capital, which was needed for its increased traffic. The Government refused to approve the request. The private railway companies in France may guarantee a fixed rate of interest on their stock, backed by a guaranteed arrangement with their Government that it will loan the railways the necessary funds at 3 per cent to pay the dividend thus guaranteed. It was under these conditions that the State acquired the franchises of the Western Railway on January 1, 1909. The last report, published in 1914, indicated that the operating railroads under Federal control increased 27.2 per cent and the total operating expenses had increased 93.3 per cent, and the taxpayers were required to meet an operating deficit of $14,752,237 for the year 1914.

The number of employees and their aggregate wages were very much increased, their efficiency perceptibly declined. One-half of their employees suffered from ill-health. The explanation of the malady is quite clear. In case of sickness, the men received full pay. The Western Railway of France is a concrete example of Government ownership. Ninety per cent of the French railway capital is in the form of bonds, which are practically guaranteed by the State. But few of the private companies meet their dividend obligations without the aid of the Government.

The reports that I have been able to obtain from all countries of the world indicate that accidents occur more frequently under Government control than under private ownership.

Title 3 of the bill contains provisions regarding the settlement of disputes that may arise between carriers and their employees. While I voted to retain the title, I did not consider it of great value, because it failed to provide sufficient penalties. A law without punishment to enforce it is weak by nature. I want a law to guard the rights of the American citizens, or a foreigner while working under the protection of our flag. [Applause.] The liberties of the employees should be protected with the same care as their employers. I want a law to punish any man, or a collection of men, who interfere with the rights of any one legitimately earning what he may for himself and his family. [Applause.] There have been but few serious strikes in the railroad world. The Pennsylvania Co. employs over 200,000 men. It is the oldest railway company in America. Its employees never attempted to stop the operation of the line. My experience as an employer of railroad men during 20 years has been such that warrants me to praise and honor them. They are loyal, intelligent students of their work, and willing to meet any emergency in reason when in the interest of the public. The very general spirit of knowledge through our public school systems "has broken down the exclusiveness of the educated classes," and thus extended to the workingman the power of meeting his employer with intelligence and judgment. If the development of the human mind does not advance civilization, then universal compulsory education will be a failure.

When the railroads are returned to private ownership, I hope the laws will be so adjusted that Federal control will not be needed to continue their operations.

Two things are essential to prevent receiverships:

Rates—the function of the Government.

Economy—the function of the railways.

The clause on page 65, commencing on line 9, reads as follows:

> The commission shall be charged with the duty and responsibility of observing and keeping informed as to the transportation needs and the transportation facilities and service of the country, and as to the operating revenues necessary to the adequacy and efficiency of such transportation facilities and service. In reaching its conclusions as to the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, the commission shall take into consideration the interest of the public, the shippers, the reasonable cost of maintenance and operation (including the wages of labor, depreciation, and taxes), and a fair return upon the value of the property used or held for the service of transportation.

This is the crux of the continuation of private ownership.

Railways can not meet the requirements of the many statutes, the rules, and regulations adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, obey its mandates, unless this commission provides a schedule of rates that will enable the railways to meet their operating expenses, including the fixed charges. The question of control at this time would not influence rate making, for rates must be increased if adequate service is to be maintained.

The American people are accustomed to an unexcelled system of railway transportation, and if they continue to demand palaces for terminals and ask to be carried over the rails at a speed of 60 miles an hour, riding in de luxe coaches, sleeping, and dining cars, they must pay for these privileges through increased rates. I believe the traveling public and the shippers will favor higher fares and charges when they understand the financial condition of the railways; when they are apprised of the fact that nearly $2,000,000,000 of railroad securities are part of the assets of life-insurance companies, and that railways, like other industries, can not continue operations when expenditures are greater than the revenues.

The rate-making clause to which I have alluded is unquestionably the one saving clause by which the railways may hold their properties. It will establish a credit basis in order that funds can be raised for additions and betterments; that new territory may be opened and new industries created, thus increasing our commerce with the world.

May individualism, the very foundation and strength of our Republic, be not superseded by nationalism, the road to inefficiency and public decay. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TEMPLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3332. An act authorizing the board of county commissioners of the County of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to construct a bridge across the Connecticut River between Windsor Locks and East Windsor at Warehouse Point, in said county and State.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], a member of the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after listening, as I have, to the praise of this bill it may be that I am going to stand alone, but I am opposed to its passage.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman is going to give us the other side of the case we ought to have a quorum here to hear him. It is one of the most important bills this House has considered. I make the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Louisiana would like to have a quorum, would he not?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I am perfectly willing to speak to those who are willing to hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [The Chair proceeded to count.]

Mr. BLANTON (during the count). Now, Mr. Chairman, that we have about 75 men in here, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is withdrawn, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] is recognized.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill in its present form, and I can not and will not vote for it unless it is materially amended. Before discussing this bill I would like to call the attention of the committee for a moment to the situation that at present confronts this House.

Congress met on May 19. The President had already stated to the people that the railroads would be returned to their owners by the first of the year. There was introduced in this House on June 2 the foundation of this bill. Day after day was consumed in hearings, and the testimony is so voluminous that I am of the opinion that practically not a Member of this House, save the membership of the committee, has in any way been able to follow the testimony adduced before that committee.

After about five months of hearings this bill was referred to a subcommittee consisting of five members, the three ranking Republicans and the two ranking Democrats. This subcommittee had this bill before them some five weeks, and they reported it to the full committee week before last. The full committee, therefore, had it before it some 10 days, and now it is before this House to-day, and under the rule adopted yesterday general debate will close to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and it is expected and presumed that this bill will be passed by this House before we adjourn on Saturday.

Now, this bill did not get into the hands of the membership of this House until yesterday—Monday. There is no man here able to inform himself in that short time as to what it contains. And I believe if they were able to inform themselves as to what is contained in this bill, it would get but very few votes in this House.

I listened this morning to the magnificent speech of our chairman, and I never heard a better presentation of a case in my life than he made. But he knows, and I know, that there are provisions in this bill that he is just as bitterly opposed to as I am; and he knows, and I know, that there are clauses contained in this bill which are of such a radical departure from all that we have heretofore known and held in regard to transportation, and I know that they were put in there over and above his protest and over and above the protest of practically half of the committee, and some of them above the protest of all the subcommittee who have so ably handled this measure.

When I state that I can not support this bill I am doing it without any reflection whatsoever upon the subcommittee or the committee itself. I believe that we in this Congress and in this House ought to deal absolutely frankly one with the other. I appreciate as fully and as completely as any man in this House the problems that confronted that committee. I appreciate their earnestness and their work. I appreciate their zealousness, their honesty of purpose, and their sincerity of conviction. But that does not, and will not, control my judgment or influence my vote.

There are many things in this bill that I approve of, but if, in order to get things that I approve of, I must vote for things that I know are wrong, then that is asking me to do something that I will not and can not do. [Applause.]

Fundamentally this bill is wrong. It makes no difference whether it was written with that view in mind purposely or not, for the effect will be the same. This bill does not take one drop of water out of the stock of a single railroad, but it drains every river and every lake in this country dry, because if it becomes law you will never hear the whistle of a steamboat upon river or lake unless that whistle and that sound is controlled, dictated, and dominated by the railroad interests of America. It makes no difference with me, gentlemen, whether the bill is written designedly for that purpose or ignorantly; the effect upon the body politic is the same. I know what is going to be the answer to that. I have heard it time and time again. The answer is going to be "we have no water transportation now."

That is true. The railroads have killed water transportation in the past. This bill gives the corpse a decent funeral; that is all. The railroads have been able to prevent water transportation. This bill gives them the power to forever prevent water competition. Pass this bill and every dollar that Congress has voted for river improvement might as well have been dumped into the middle of the Atlantic. Pass this bill and the dream of the utilization of our waterways will never come about. Pass this bill and you have placed water transportation at the mercy of an enemy that has never known mercy.

The most remarkable thing to me about the railroads of America is that, unable themselves to do the business of this people, admittedly unable to furnish us with the transportation facilities we need, yet in season and out they seek to prevent the utilization of the greatest system of waterways with which God has ever blessed a country. The railroads can not perform the functions to-day that they ought to perform. The railroads to-day can not give us the transportation facilities that we are entitled to, that our needs demand, that our industries require, and that the growth of this Nation and this people absolutely must have. Yet, unable as they are to give it, by hook and by crook, by every device known to the human mind and human ingenuity, they have worked to prevent any competition whatsoever by water.

This bill that is before you to-day is not the bill that was considered by our committee. This bill has been so worded and amended, sometimes to its benefit, sometimes to its disadvantage, that it is practically not even the bill in any shape that the subcommittee reported to the full committee. If you will turn to page 58 of this bill, paragraph 6, you will find incorporated in there certain language known as the Rich amendment. It begins on line 10 and ends on line 22. The Rich amendment was urged upon our committee by Mr. Edgar Rich, a lawyer of Boston, and the effect of the Rich amendment is to do away with that part of the Panama Canal act which prohibited a railroad line from competing with itself by water.

Do you gentlemen know what that means? If the railroads have the right, the legal right, to compete with themselves by water, as proposed here by this gentleman from Boston representing certain interests, then that means simply this, and nothing more, that they will see to it that nobody else competes with them by water. That is all that it can mean.

Here is a river paralleling a railroad. You and I put our money into a steamboat. There is enough freight originating along that stream to make our venture profitable, and yet every ton of freight that we carry we take from the railroad, and the process to ruin us is as old as the history of rail itself. It is this: When that happens the railroad puts a boat into that trade, too. Now, there is not enough trade there for two boats, or if there is the railroad manages to get it. It can run its boat at a loss until it has driven the independent boat off the river, and then when the independent boat disappears, the next act in the tragedy is the disappearance of the railroad boat. And yet, on page 58, in the amendment proposed by Mr. Rich, you write the proposition that you not only will permit that kind of business, but you authorize it and legalize it.

Why, my friends, the chairman of the committee [Mr. ESCH] made a talk this morning about this benefiting lake transportation, and he spoke about the disappearance of the boats off the Lakes. We have heard the gentleman from Wisconsin; you would have thought that nothing had driven them off the Lakes save and except the provisions of the Panama Canal act. And yet I distinctly remember seeing pictures in the papers not long ago, when in the eagerness to get bottoms lake vessels were actually cut in two in order that the two halves might be taken through the canal to the ocean. You have seen them.

They say there are no boats now. No; and how have boats been prevented from being on the Lakes and on the rivers? There is not a man who does not know of what I am speaking when I speak of potential competition. There is not a man who lives on lake or river or bayou or navigable stream of any description who does not know what is meant by potential competition. It has not been practiced in the last few years, I admit, but it was practiced long enough by the railroads and permitted by the commission to absolutely destroy river competition throughout the length and breadth of this country, and to practically destroy the use of the Panama Canal itself.

Here we have millions of dollars invested in the Panama Canal, and yet we have permitted rates to be made that absolutely prevented the use of the Panama Canal, and prevented the tonnage tolls from flowing into the Treasury of the United States. It was done for whom and at whose suggestion? The railroads! All through this bill, all through Title IV, runs the control of water and water transportation, tied up in this bill in such a manner that you can not disconnect one from the other; tied up so that the bill is almost incapable of being amended.

Take the dock provisions. You will find those on page 60—beginning on page 59, section 411. I have not the time in my hour to read it. Read it for yourselves. Study what it means. Is it in the interest of water carriers? There is not a line in it that the water carriers have ever asked for. There is not a line in this bill in regard to water transportation that a shipper by water, real or potential, has ever asked for. There is not a line in this bill that any man who has ever used the water of this Nation—canal, river, lake, or coastal boat—there is not a line in this bill that any one of those men who ever used or expects to use the waters, coastal or inland, of this Nation has asked for. There is not a provision in this bill that was not submitted by every railroad interest to our committee. Therefore if every railroad interest asked for these restrictions, and not the user of a boat, not the owner of a boat has asked for it, nor a shipper by water, nor one hoping to be a shipper in the future, am I not justified in saying that it was written for the railroads, and against the water transportation systems of this Nation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I want to conclude my argument, because I am pressed for time, and then I will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. May I call the attention of this committee to this one fact in regard to section 411? Turn to page 60, line 1, and look at the words. Nothing escaped them. They passed nothing up. Look at the words:

Irrespective of the ownership of the dock.

What was that put in there for? Because not all the docks in this land are owned by individuals. Not all the docks in America are owned by railroads or by steamboat companies. A great many of the docks along the great rivers and in the great cities are owned by the municipalities thereof. They have taxed themselves to build their terminal facilities for boats and water transportation.

Down in my State we have great docks at the city of New Orleans. They were not built by any steamboat or railroad company. They were not built by the municipality of New Orleans. They are owned by the people of the sovereign State of Louisiana, controlled by and through a State agency. Bonds have been issued for the building of those docks. The revenues of those docks are pledged to the payment of the interest and the principal of the bonds. Under management of this State institution we have built up a port business there until New Orleans to-day is the second port in the United States of America. Those are our docks, built with our money. Back of the obligations that built them is the honor of the State. Yet under the provisions of this bill, and if the courts should uphold it, the Interstate Commerce Commission could take over the control and operation of those docks and could fix the terms and conditions under which a ship or steamboat could tie up at them.

Then, connecting those docks with every railroad that enters New Orleans is a belt railroad, owned by no railroad company and by no steamship company; but owned, operated, and controlled by the municipality of New Orleans itself, operated by the city. Yet under this bill and the verbiage thereof the Interstate Commerce Commission, a Federal agency, could run that belt road and prescribe the terms and conditions under which it could be used. Gentlemen, a condition of that kind is absolutely unthinkable. It is so repugnant to every thought of government, it is so repugnant to every principle of this Government, that we should vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission, a Federal board, the control of a public utility of the State and of the city, that it seems to me inconceivable that it should commend itself to anyone here. The National Government has never contributed one cent to the construction of this utility in the past, and never will in the future.

Gentlemen argue that that is a power conferred by the bill which will never be exercised. That was the argument I met with in the committee. Gentlemen said it was a power granted that will never be exercised. That is the most foolish lullaby to sing yourself into security with that has ever been sung. There never was a power granted to any governmental agency that was not exercised sooner or later, and generally sooner. I remember here in this House when we passed the Federal control act I opposed granting to the Director General the right to fix rates. I opposed it on this floor, and we heard the same song then: "Oh, it is a power that is granted unto him, but he will never exercise it."

I stated before the committee and here upon this floor that if you gave him the power he would have to exercise it. I was not a prophet, but I knew human nature. I knew the exigencies of the situation. And lo and behold, we woke up one morning and found that freight rates had been advanced overnight 25 per cent. I am not complaining at the advance. I am merely stating that we conferred the power and that the power was exercised.

I have cited my own great city, but there are other gentlemen whom I see in this House right now whose municipalities and communities have voted bonds and have built their own terminal facilities. Before you vote for this bill I want you to understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission can dominate and control and fix rates, fares, and charges for every terminal, every dock, every belt road, irrespective of its ownership.

I could go on with a recitation of these provisions. The whole bill is full of the control vested, not for but against water transportation. If it did not do anything in the world except—innocently it may be—to prevent water transportation, this bill ought never to pass.

Do you know that we have here in this country the greatest unused asset that any people on earth ever had? That is our water transportation, which is the greatest asset that any nation on earth to-day has or that any nation ever has had. We have stretching out through this land great highways builded by the hand of God Himself, placed there in order to meet our wants, in order to enhance our progress and our prosperity. Millions on top of millions of dollars have been spent by this Congress to make these waterways safe and navigable. Yet while those appropriations were being made and those laws were being passed, on the one hand, laws were being enacted, on the other hand, the effect of which has always been to prevent water transportation. This bill does what, clearly and concisely? As I said a moment ago, it gives water transportation a decent funeral, because the railroads of the country have killed it already in the past.

Mr. CLEARY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. Does not the gentleman think that the transferring of goods from rail to water and from water to rail is conducive to the best interests of the country?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not think anything about it. I know it.

Mr. CLEARY. As long as it does that, is it not a benefit?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not think anything about the proposition. It is just as true as that two and two make four that whenever you facilitate transportation between water and rail you are developing the transportation interests and the other interests of your country. But I am not going to be fooled, sir, into voting for a bill that, while it pretends to do that, actually slaughters, knifes, destroys, and annihilates what little water transportation we have now and forbids it for all time to come in the future.

Mr. CLEARY. May I ask where the bill does that?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. When did the gentleman get this bill?

Mr. CLEARY. It has been lying around since last night. But we all want to know about it. I know that it has been useful through my life. The connection between water and rail has been very useful. I have shipped millions of tons in that way, and I am wondering where this bill interferes with it.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I am not disputing the fact that the gentleman has done that. It is a good thing. On the contrary, I agree with everything the gentleman said, but I say to you that you got that bill yesterday, and it is utterly impossible, gentlemen of the committee, for any man on earth to understand what that bill says and what that bill does by a mere reading of it.

Mr. CLEARY. Will not the gentleman point out in the bill where it does this damage?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I have been speaking along that line for 35 minutes. I am sorry I have not been able to furnish the gentleman with the information. I have stated what the Rich amendment would do, and I can only judge the future by the past. I know what railroad competition has done in the past, and if the gentleman does not know it he ought to. Every man who has lived on a navigable stream or a navigable lake knows that the railroads of this country have strangled water competition. That is as well known as another fact, which I do not propose to argue, that the sun rises in the East and sets in the West. I also know that if you give the railroads the power that this bill confers on them in the Rich amendment, on page 58, they will strangle water competition in the future as they have strangled it in the past.

Mr. CLEARY. If the gentleman will yield, I am asking these questions in good faith. There are thousands and tens of thousands of tons of freight being shipped from the Jersey shore delivered by rail to the water. Hundreds of thousands of tons come over the Pennsylvania Railroad for transport by water.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not doubt it, but I shall have to decline to yield further to the gentleman. I can not convince anyone that there is no such thing to-day in America as some water transportation. We do have some. I could not and would not undertake to convince any man in this House that not a ton of freight moves over the water. It does so move, but there is a fraction of an ounce that does move by water in comparison to what we ought to move. And if it is not a well-known fact that the railroads have strangled river competition and water competition in this country of ours, then there is no fact known to the American people.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. I am very much interested in water transportation on the Great Lakes. Most of that transportation is of iron ore. How would this bill affect that?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Here is my idea about that, if I may be permitted to say so. The contention that is made by gentlemen who favor this Rich amendment is that no capital will go into boats except railroad capital, and I think that contention is absolutely untenable for this reason: That if capital can make money out of boats, capital will go into boats whether it is railroad capital or outside capital. This bill gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to make rates when the haul is partly over water and partly over rail. They ought to have that power. They have that power, and this bill continues that power. If the transportation of iron ore on the Lakes is profitable, then outside capital will build the boats just as quickly as railroad capital will build the boats for that transportation, provided the outside boats are treated as squarely by the railroads as the railroads treat their own boats. That is the only reason why it might not otherwise work.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. O'CONNOR. How could the Interstate Commerce Commission by taking over the administration of the docks in New Orleans, now managed by the dock commission, impair the port facilities of Louisiana or the revenue?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not know. I do not know how they could impair them, but I do know—the gentleman means legally—legally I do not think they could do anything at all in connection with impairing the revenue; but when it comes to the administration of our docks, when it comes to stating what vessels shall land at the docks, when it comes to the internal administration of those docks, I contend that they must be managed by the State of Louisiana, controlled by the State, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission has nothing to do with them, and must not have anything to do with them.

Let us get to another amendment—the amendment known in our committee as the Merritt amendment. The only reason that I call it that is not that I want to pass any encomiums upon it, but because that is the name of its author. I was taught at the very beginning of my legal career that when two men met to adjust their accounts one could not compel the other on an open account to pay what was owed him without giving that other the right to set up and prove offsets and compensations. If that is not Hornbook law and Hornbook justice, nothing ever was. Yet the committee bill has been amended so that that could be done. The subcommittee reported a bill where that would be done in the settlement of our accounts with the railroads, but the bill that comes before us prevents that. The bill that comes before you, stripped of its beautiful verbiage, laid bare of all of its technical phrases, means this, that when we come to a settlement with the railroads we must pay them on the mail, dollar for dollar, whatever we owe them, but the railroads—ah, they belong to a consecrated class of people—that is not true of them. Oh, no! We can not say to the railroads when we come to settle the debt, "We owe you $50,000,000, but you owe us $30,000,000, and we will pay you $20,000,000." If you pass this bill, they say, "You must pay the $50,000,000," and the railroad will then be able to say, "After a while we will get together and we will figure on the $30,000,000, and then we will give you our note for it, and you can collect it if God is willing and the property is solvent." Why, it does not even prescribe in this bill that the amount that is owed to the Government shall be first mortgage. Oh, you throw a sop to public opinion by stating that it shall be a first mortgage wherever practicable.

If I have a man's cash in my possession and he sues me for a settlement, I am going to say, "Yes; I owe you $600, but you owe me $300, and we will settle on that basis, and I will plead my compensation and set-offs." There is not a man in the Union who can not do that to-day, and the only thing in all America, the only person, real or natural, who can not take advantage of that law will be the United States of America if you pass this bill. You will pay the railroads dollar for dollar, cash on the mail what you owe them, and you will take their obligations for what they owe you.

Mr. LARSEN. Where is that set out?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. It is on page 9, beginning on line 25 and running all through page 10 and all through page 11, down to and including line 6, on page 12; and that is all those three pages mean—that the Government must pay the railroads dollar for dollar when they settle, but that the Government must take the railroads' obligations for what the railroads owe the Government.

Another provision that I seriously object to is found on page 65, lines 9 to 21, inclusive. That is a provision that sets up for the first time in the history of rate legislation in America a rule of rate making. What does it mean? You and I form ourselves into a corporation and we build a railroad where it ought never to have been. The railroad has never made a dollar, and the chances are that it never will make a dollar. We absolutely overturn the rule that has existed for all time, that a rate must be just and reasonable, and we write into the law that the Interstate Commerce Commission must make a rate so that you and I may make money on our railroad. No matter how dishonestly the road may have been run and is run, no matter how inefficiently the road may have been run and is run, no matter how wastefully the road has been run and is run, if you vote for that provision the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing its rates must not only remember that the rates must be just and reasonable but they must also fix a rate that will pay a return on investment, real or fictitious. Why, you overturn the entire structure of rate making as it has been known in this country from the very beginning.

Then, to cap the column that has been erected to the memory of Government control for the last two years, you have done this. You have reached out and saved from destruction the standard return, against which I protested at the time it was passed, for I said it was too much and I voted against it. You save it from the wreck of the Federal control act, and you breathe the breath of life into its nostrils for six months longer, but with this glorious, shining exception: Under the Federal control act, if a railroad made more than its standard return, that excess went into the Treasury, and if it made less than the standard return you made it up; but under this wonderful provision the roads that make more than the standard return during the six months put it into their pockets, while the road that does not make the standard return presents its voucher at the Treasury and its loss is made up. Can you beat it? Can you justify it? Here is a railroad that makes 30 per cent. That is fine business. They take it and put it into their pockets. Here is another that makes less than the standard return and we say, "That is all right; that will be made up out of the pockets of the taxpayers." What I contended for in the committee and what I contend for here is that if you are going to project this standard return for six months after the passage of this act, there is but one fair and just way of doing it. Do not exempt the prosperous and take in only the poor. Take them all in for six months just as you did under the Federal control act. Let the Government get the advantage of what the rich roads are going to make, as the Government will have to make up the deficit of the poor roads.

This bill just reeks from cover to cover with that kind of inconsistency. No man can discuss this bill and do it justice in the length of time that has been assigned to me. I might take the word "discuss" and strike off the first syllable, and then no man could render it justice in an hour. There is not a line in the provisions that I have discussed that is placed there for the benefit of anybody in the world except the great transportation systems of America.

And if this bill becomes a law, you put the transportation facilities of America forever under the domination of these great railroads. As far as I am concerned, I never will vote for a bill I am honestly and sincerely convinced means that and nothing but that. Transportation is the greatest question we have to solve. We must solve it; we will solve it some time.

I want in closing to say one word of warning, gentlemen, and it is a solemn word of warning. If this bill—now, mark you, I am telling you, and men will live to see what I say come true—if this bill is the best that the brain of men who believe in private ownership of railroads can do, then the answer to this bill by an indignant and outraged people is going to be Government ownership. [Applause.] If that is the best that you can do, then God save the mark.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Does this bill take away from the Interstate Commerce Commission any of their regulatory powers they had previous to the war?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Not a bit.

Mr. COOPER. Does it not give more power?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. All the power in the world, practically.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been a pretty fair body and handled the railroads pretty well in this country?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes; I do. I think they have handled them fine. I am talking about water. Its vision has never so far included transportation by water.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the gentleman was talking about railroads rather than water.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. About the water proposition. As I understood the section my colleague was discussing, this bill gives the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to come in where there is competition between railroad and water rates and fix a proper rate so as to protect the water traffic and to prevent it from being driven away—that it puts this power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and adjust the rates and fix the minimum or the maximum that must be charged both for rail transportation and water transportation?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Well, if the Interstate Commerce Commission have that power, could they not protect the water transportation from being driven off?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not think so. Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission—I do not attack the commission; it is a splendid body of men trained along the lines of the development of rail transportation of this country. But the Interstate Commerce Commission has never done anything, as the gentleman from Louisiana well knows, to encourage river transportation, lake transportation, or coast-to-coast transportation, and by their acts under the provision of section 4 of the commerce act they have utilized the power and stretched it into a potential competition until they have discouraged and driven off river transportation.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Now, this is true, is it not, that in order to save this water transportation there must be power lodged somewhere to fix the rate?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. No; I do not think so; to the very contrary, I think when you add the power that this bill does for the first time to make minimum water rates you are absolutely signing the death warrant of water transportation.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. But if you leave the rates there with nobody to fix the rates, it occurs to me, now, that they can continue to drive the boats off the rivers.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. There is no place in the country where rail transportation and water transportation can be used but what water transportation has practically disappeared——

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I know that.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. That is true everywhere.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. For the reason that the railroads have always cut under the water transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I had not expected at this time to discuss the details of the bill, and I do not expect to do so now, but as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] has done me the honor to refer to section 205 of the bill as the Merritt amendment, if section 205 remains in the bill, as I hope and believe it will, and if by any chance my name should be connected with it, I think I shall have a title to enduring fame, because I think it is the real foundation of constructive legislation for the railroads, and that is the foundation for business prosperity for this country.

As I say, I do not propose now to discuss the details of the paragraph, but simply in a broad way to point out one or two fundamental errors under which the gentleman from Louisiana seems to labor concerning that paragraph. In brief, the paragraph is intended simply and solely to keep apart, as every manufacturer and certainly every railroad has to keep apart in its expenditures and accounts, the capital account and current account. No railroad, even in prosperous times, can make its improvements out of current receipts, and this paragraph simply takes account of that fact. So far from providing that there shall be no set-off of the debt of the roads to the Government as against what the Government still owes the roads, the facts are that under this provision there will be a set-off of more than five hundred and fifty millions of money which the roads owe to the Government. You will see, if you will look at the bill, there is a special provision there for set-off by the President under the terms of the existing contract; and now that is all I need to say for the present, because I did not want you even overnight to be misled by the idea that there is anything unfair to the Government. I wish at this time to give a few facts concerning Government-owned roads in other countries, which have been operated under substantially the same conditions as would obtain in this country. About 35 years ago in a famous book, which has been a railway textbook ever since, President Hadley, of Yale, stated "that a State was more likely to tax industry than to foster it"; "that State management is more costly than private management"; that "the political danger would be very great"; that "politics would tend to corrupt the railway management, and the railway management would tend to corrupt politics."

I submit that the experience of many countries has since verified Mr. Hadley's opinion.

The facts I give are all taken from testimony before either the Senate or House committee.

I confine myself first to the experience of France, and second to Australia, because both of these countries are democratic countries, and the management of the railroads is subject to the same influences which would exist here in the case of State-owned or State-operated railways.

Everyone knows the tendency of the French mind toward symmetry and order, and the development of French railways has proceeded from the very beginning on a definite plan.

Originally all the railways were privately owned, but operated under strict Government regulation, and the return on the investment in bonds and stocks was, if not in terms, practically guaranteed by the Government.

The rates and management of the roads were such that most of them, and, I believe, all except one, usually earned the guaranteed return.

Among the great companies the weakest financially was the Western, a large proportion of its mileage being in Brittany, one of the poorest districts of the country. It was necessary for the Government every year to pay a large amount over the returns from the railway in order to meet the guaranteed interest and dividends. When it became necessary for the company to increase its facilities capital was not attracted, owing to the poor showing of earnings, and finally, under the urgings of the Socialist Party and of the employees of the road, a bill was passed in the Chamber of Deputies in 1906 for the State to take over the road. This was resisted in the senate for nearly two years, but was finally passed under the influence of Monsieur Clemenceau, then prime minister.

The results were that the operating expenses rose from $28,000,000 the last year of private operation to over $30,000,000 in the first year of Government operation, then to $35,000,000, then to $39,000,000, and finally, the year before the war, to $41,000,000. Meanwhile the operating revenues had risen 31 per cent, but the operating expenses had increased 50 per cent.

The net revenue in the worst year of the company rule was never below $12,750,000, but in the four years after the Government had taken control it fell to slightly over $5,000,000, and the operating ratio rose from 67 per cent to 85 per cent.

During the last 10 years of company management the State had to pay an average of just under $3,000,000 a year to meet its liability under the guaranty, and during the three years after the transfer it had to find increasing amounts each year, until in 1913, the year before the war, the deficit was just under $15,000,000, about five times as much.

Nor is there any comfort to be gained with the suggestion that although the expenses to the country were greater the service was better, for, as a matter of fact, the service became absolutely demoralized. The time of the express trains was slowed down, while at the same time the number of accidents and damage suits increased so that from an average of about $500,000 a year the State had to pay about $2,000,000 a year. The service was so demoralized in the suburbs that employers insisted that their employees who had to come to work in the city must live in some other section.

The French economist, M. Leroy-Beaulieu, gives the reasons for this deplorable situation, as follows:

In the first place it is the abuse of formalism and red tape, with all the delays which follow and which are directly in conflict with commercial needs. In the second place it is the lack of stability. The director and all the chiefs of the service change at the will of the ministers, whilst in the private companies the higher personnel is maintained a long time, fulfilling the same functions. It is next the political influence which enters into the choice and advancement of the personnel. It is, lastly, the lack of discipline which also results from the political influence at work. From the electoral point of view, the lower staff, being much more numerous, will always have much more power than the superior staff. It is always on the side of the former that many deputies will be systematically ranged. Above all, it is impossible to be at once controller and controlled. If one of the great French companies under private management renders poor service, public opinion is not slow to move the public power, and as this has the means to bring pressure indirectly but in many ways upon the companies they are led to reform. On the contrary, when complaints are made against the State itself the administration, irresponsible, does not listen. Rather, it seems indignant that particular individuals or even large associations should dare to find that all is not perfect. "I have not seen without a certain astonishment," said the minister of public works in the chamber, "the chamber of commerce criticize the actions of the State in its (their) reports upon the railways." The same minister has dismissed an employee from his office who was at the head of a section of a passenger line which emitted protestation against the delays on the western State service in the Paris suburbs. When the minister was reproached in the senate, he declared himself ready to do the same again. One may see how dangerous to the liberty of citizens the extension of the industrial régime of the State would be, where the number of functionaries would be indefinitely multiplied and where they would no longer have the right to complain.

He then gives figures as to the tremendous increase in the personnel, the fact that in all the Government bureaus it takes from two to three times as many people to do the same work as under private management, and that the service is made expensive and demoralized by excessive Government red tape. As a supreme example, he quotes from the letter of a station master, as follows:

In the time of the Western Co. we station masters had orders to use the rolling stock as quickly as possible and to send to a given station all that we did not ourselves require. Under the State all is changed. Every station master is forbidden to load any wagon without the orders of the distribution bureau of the district. This bureau is, as is well known, a new creation, specially designed for the purpose of finding situations for so many more bureaucrats. Recently having received two wagons loaded with horses, accompanied by an order to send these wagons to Caen after they were unloaded, I thought to do well by loading in these two wagons 200 sacks of grain, which had been waiting in the sheds for several days to go to Caen. But, alas, I did not know the bureau of distribution. The next day I saw my two wagons return, and I received at the same time an order to unload them. I was reproved into the bargain for excess of zeal. I had to obey the order. That evening I sent the wagons empty to Caen. Next day I received two others, also empty, in which to load the grain.

I think it does not need any great strain on anyone's imagination to believe that substantially similar results might happen in this good country of ours.

Finally M. Leroy-Beaulieu says that the results of this Western Railroad of France have provoked a very lively movement not only against the repurchase of the railways but against all extension of State industry.

In Australia the railways were, in general, State owned from the beginning, due largely to the fact that in the early days the great business opportunities in Australia in the way of mining, sheep culture, and so forth, offered such tremendous opportunities for profit that the ordinary profit on railway operation did not attract private capital. Accordingly, the different Australian States constructed and have always managed their own railways.

I can not take time to go into details concerning these Australian railways, but as to whether they possess any advantage either by way of service or economy in the service of the people, I quote the following:

Some years ago a distinguished railway man went from America to assume the post of chief commissioner—in other words, president—of one of the most important Australian State systems. After he had been in charge for a year or two he sent to a railway friend at home statistics showing the improvements and economies effected under his management. The friend, in acknowledging the receipt, pointed out that the figures furnished did not include the ton-miles of traffic and therefore neither receipts nor cost could be worked out on a ton-mileage basis, and asked whether it was possible that a railway man accustomed to American methods failed to keep statistical records in this form. The answer was, in effect, as follows: "I have the ton-mileage figures. I dare not publish them. If I did publish them, they would show a ton-mile rate so excessive, as compared with other countries similarly situated, where the traffic is mainly in agricultural products carried long distances, that public opinion would enforce a sweeping reduction in rates and bankrupt the undertaking." It may be added, as proving that the chief commissioner in question had good reason for desiring to avoid a comparison, that two—New South Wales and South Australia—out of the seven Australasian State railway systems do publish ton-mileage statistics. They show ton-mile earnings of 2.20 cents and 2.12 cents, respectively. The corresponding figures for the private railways of Canada is 0.75 cent, and for the private railways of the United States 0.738 cent.

Mr. Acworth, the great English expert, for purposes of service compares New South Wales with Texas, the type of the country being substantially the same, although Texas has a much greater population. He finds that the freight rate per ton-mile is more than double in New South Wales what it was in Texas in 1915, and states that the private railways of Texas perform for the Texas public nearly four times as much work as the railways of New South Wales perform for the public of that State. And he finds further that if the Texas railways had been operated as expensively as the New South Wales railways they would have had no net revenues at all.

The operation of the Australian railways has been a source of infinite perplexity to the country and Governments involved. They have gone through all the phases of direct Government operation through an executive minister, and, when that proved unsatisfactory they tried operation by commission, and Mr. Acworth states that the last year he was in Victoria they were looking about to make their fifth change.

And in Victoria, in the effort to prevent constant political pressure and interference, they have passed an act, which I believe is still in existence, which provides substantially as follows:

That if anybody "employed in the public service, either in the railway service, the police service, or the State rivers and water-supply department, shall, either directly or indirectly, take any part whatsoever in or in relation to election of members to the legislative council or the legislative assembly, or directly or indirectly in any way take part in the political affairs of the State of Victoria otherwise than by recording a vote at a parliamentary election," he shall be dismissed, etc.; and "no person or class of persons so employed shall, directly or indirectly, use or attempt to use any influence in respect to any matter affecting the remuneration or position in the public service of either himself or any other person," and the penalty for that is that "such person may be fined in a sum not exceeding £10, and may be reduced in class, subdivision, grade, or status, and salary, or he may be dismissed or his services may be dispensed with, provided that such person shall not be dismissed or have his services dispensed with for any contravention of this section without the consent of the governor in council."

The uniform result of all Government ownership of railroads has been to deaden initiative and to repress invention. Mr. Acworth states that it would be difficult to point out a single important invention or improvement the introduction of which the world owes to a State railway, and I think that what he says about the public management of railways will strike a responsive chord in the breasts of many Members of this House who have to deal with Government departments:

The railway management is essentially a commercial business. You want all the commercial qualities of planning ahead and being ready to take up any new technical improvement, and desire to cut down expenses at any point, and things of that kind. And he has to keep his work going. It is quite clear that you do not get as prompt service from public officials. I do not know what it is in this country, but it is a matter of regular knowledge in England that if one writes to a Government department it takes a very long time to get an answer; it takes a week to get an acknowledgment and two or three weeks often to get any real answer. If you write to a railroad company, you get an acknowledgment by return of post and an answer in two or three days. There is no question as between public service, where you can compare them in England, and private service. There is no question about the commercial alacrity of one as compared to the other.

And so I submit that the few instances and figures which I have given above, and which may be easily multiplied and elaborated, demonstrate the thesis set forth by President Hadley which I quoted at the beginning.

If the railroad business is a commercial business, it must to be efficient be managed on commercial lines and with commercial incentives to efficiency and initiative and with proper rewards therefor. It must not be subject to political influence either as to personnel or management or rates.

Another proposition for the conduct of the railroads would need no attention except that by persistent propaganda through certain organizations, who would have a direct interest in and benefit from the plan, it seems to be attracting more or less attention.

And owing to the fatal facility with which many classes of people are attracted by pleasant sounding words, and the fatal habit of not taking pains to find out what plan such words really cover, the so-called Plumb plan seems to be favorably regarded by certain well-meaning people.

And if this bill becomes a law, you put the transportation facilities of America forever under the domination of these great railroads. As far as I am concerned, I never will vote for a bill I am honestly and sincerely convinced means that and nothing but that. Transportation is the greatest question we have to solve. We must solve it; we will solve it some time.

I want in closing to say one word of warning, gentlemen, and it is a solemn word of warning. If this bill—now, mark you, I am telling you, and men will live to see what I say come true—if this bill is the best that the brain of men who believe in private ownership of railroads can do, then the answer to this bill by an indignant and outraged people is going to be Government ownership. [Applause.] If that is the best that you can do, then God save the mark.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Does this bill take away from the Interstate Commerce Commission any of their regulatory powers they had previous to the war?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Not a bit.

Mr. COOPER. Does it not give more power?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. All the power in the world, practically.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been a pretty fair body and handled the railroads pretty well in this country?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes; I do. I think they have handled them fine. I am talking about water. Its vision has never so far included transportation by water.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the gentleman was talking about railroads rather than water.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I had not expected at this time to discuss the details of the bill, and I do not expect to do so now, but as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] has done me the honor to refer to section 205 of the bill as the Merritt amendment, if section 205 remains in the bill, as I hope and believe it will, and if by any chance my name should be connected with it, I think I shall have a title to enduring fame, because I think it is the real foundation of constructive legislation for the railroads, and that is the foundation for business prosperity for this country.

They have gone through all the phases of direct Government operation through an executive minister, and, when that proved unsatisfactory they tried operation by commission, and Mr. Acworth states that the last year he was in Victoria they were looking about to make their fifth change.

And in Victoria, in the effort to prevent constant political pressure and interference, they have passed an act, which I believe is still in existence, which provides substantially as follows:

That if anybody "employed in the public service, either in the railway service, the police service, or the State rivers and water-supply department, shall, either directly or indirectly, take any part whatsoever in or in relation to election of members to the legislative council or the legislative assembly, or directly or indirectly in any way take part in the political affairs of the State of Victoria otherwise than by recording a vote at a parliamentary election," he shall be dismissed, etc.; and "no person or class of persons so employed shall, directly or indirectly, use or attempt to use any influence in respect to any matter affecting the remuneration or position in the public service of either himself or any other person," and the penalty for that is that "such person may be fined in a sum not exceeding £10, and may be reduced in class, subdivision, grade, or status, and salary, or he may be dismissed or his services may be dispensed with, provided that such person shall not be dismissed or have his services dispensed with for any contravention of this section without the consent of the governor in council."

The uniform result of all Government ownership of railroads has been to deaden initiative and to repress invention. Mr. Acworth states that it would be difficult to point out a single important invention or improvement the introduction of which the world owes to a State railway, and I think that what he says about the public management of railways will strike a responsive chord in the breasts of many Members of this House who have to deal with Government departments:

The railway management is essentially a commercial business. You want all the commercial qualities of planning ahead and being ready to take up any new technical improvement, and desire to cut down expenses at any point, and things of that kind. And he has to keep his work going. It is quite clear that you do not get as prompt service from public officials. I do not know what it is in this country, but it is a matter of regular knowledge in England that if one writes to a Government department it takes a very long time to get an answer; it takes a week to get an acknowledgment and two or three weeks often to get any real answer. If you write to a railroad company, you get an acknowledgment by return of post and an answer in two or three days. There is no question as between public service, where you can compare them in England, and private service. There is no question about the commercial alacrity of one as compared to the other.

And so I submit that the few instances and figures which I have given above, and which may be easily multiplied and elaborated, demonstrate the thesis set forth by President Hadley which I quoted at the beginning.

If the railroad business is a commercial business, it must to be efficient be managed on commercial lines and with commercial incentives to efficiency and initiative and with proper rewards therefor. It must not be subject to political influence either as to personnel or management or rates.

Another proposition for the conduct of the railroads would need no attention except that by persistent propaganda through certain organizations, who would have a direct interest in and benefit from the plan, it seems to be attracting more or less attention.

And owing to the fatal facility with which many classes of people are attracted by pleasant sounding words, and the fatal habit of not taking pains to find out what plan such words really cover, the so-called Plumb plan seems to be favorably regarded by certain well-meaning people.

It may be worth while, therefore, to devote a very few minutes to a broad analysis of the plan and to show by figures where the plan would land the country.

I hope that many Members of the House will take the trouble to read from page 2045, in the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the testimony of Mr. Earl H. Morton, who is president of the Order of Railway Station Agents, and who states that he gives his testimony so that the committee may not think that all railroad employees believe in Government ownership of railroads.

The avowed object of the Plumb plan, as stated by its author, is "public ownership and democracy in the control of the railroads."

This statement is correct so far as public ownership is concerned, because the plan is for the United States to buy every railroad in the country. The democracy of the plan comes in, however, solely from the fact that the people of the whole country will foot the bills, and then, in current phrase, would "get off" and hand over the management of this $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 of property to 15 men, two-thirds of the 15 being elected by the employees of the railroads, who would then control this $18,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000 of property, would control their own wages and salaries, would profit if there was any profit, while all the loss would be borne by the taxpayers.

But worse than the financial side of the matter is that these 15 men would have in their control the entire business structure of the United States, which depends on the operation of the railroads.

The arguments put forth in favor of the plan are perhaps on their face alluring, in that they propose to furnish railway service at cost. But we have seen that in Government-operated roads this cost is many times that under private operation, and under the Plumb plan I see no reason to doubt that the cost would be even greater than under straight Government operation. It is claimed that there would be incentives to efficiency, because under the plan a certain portion of the profits would go to the employees.

Let us examine this claim in the light of actual figures. Suppose the employees should make demands on the directors of the railroads, when operating under the Plumb plan, for an advance of 25 per cent in wages. As two-thirds of the directors are elected by the employees, the chances are that they would get it. Then a man with a wage of $2,000 would get an increase of $500, whether the road made any profit or not. Suppose, however, he waited, under the theory of the Plumb plan, for his dividend from profits. Even under the impossible supposition that the roads would make $500,000,000 clear profit in a year, if there were 2,000,000 employees, the share of the $2,000 employee would be $125. The question then is whether a sure $500 raise of wages or a possible, but doubtful, $125 at the end of a year of waiting would have the greatest attraction. In other words, would it be easier to have the directors vote an increase of wages and be easy-going and get $500 or to be industrious and efficient for a whole year for a possible $125 which might not materialize?

As a matter of fact, the speciousness of this argument for efficiency needs no further statement than that the operating expenses at the present time are five times the capital charge. The Plumb plan advocates claim that if the Government buys the railroads the capital charge would be reduced, but if it were reduced as much as they claim, which is not possible, there could be no appreciable effect on rates unless the operating expenses were reduced, and the probability of that when the men fix their own salaries can easily be understood. The Plumb-plan advocates stop at no claim, however preposterous, stating, as they do, that under the Plumb plan it would be possible to reduce passenger rates to 1½ cents per mile and freight rates 40 per cent.

Now, on the basis of present traffic a reduction of passenger rates to 1½ cents per mile would reduce passenger earnings $640,000,000 a year, and a reduction of 40 per cent would reduce freight earnings $1,800,000,000 a year, making a total reduction in earnings of $2,440,000,000 a year. After this reduction, on the present basis, the earnings left to the railroads after present operating expenses would only be about $2,600,000,000 a year, but the present operating expenses are $4,200,000,000, so that after these reductions the earnings of the roads would be $1,600,000,000 less than enough to pay operating expenses and taxes. If you add to this the money necessary to pay interest upon the bonds issued to buy the railroads, which would be $900,000,000, you would produce an annual deficit of $2,500,000,000 a year, which the public would have to pay in taxes. This is where the public ownership of the railroads and their operation under the Plumb plan would leave the country, and there is no possible escape from these figures.

Mr. Morton, of the Railway Station Agents, points out and gives the reasons for showing that there would be tremendous internal politics in the railway organizations to elect directors, and that the result of this politics would not be to elect the best brains, but those who would be most subservient to the electors. I can not do better than to conclude this short review of the Plumb plan by quoting the conclusion of Mr. Morton's testimony on this subject:

> The unavoidable conclusion is that the directors elected by the officers and employees would not necessarily be fit men to serve as directors, but that, on the contrary, the chances are many to one that they would be unfit men for this most important work. The directors selected in this way would, in turn, select the men who would have direct charge of the operation of the railroads. Since the directors would be anxious to keep their jobs, they would be pretty sure in selecting the men who were to operate the railroads to appoint men who would use their influence to help reelect the directors. Since the wages and salaries of the officers and employees would not depend at all upon how efficiently they did their work—because the wages and salaries would be fixed by the board of directors which the officers and employees had selected—there would be no incentive to appoint men to the chief operating positions on the railroads because of their fitness for their jobs. But if the ablest men in the railroad service were not given the most important position in the service, they would inevitably leave the railroad business, thus depriving it of its brains. It is necessary, however, to have men of experience and to give them positions of the greatest responsibility and authority if efficient operation is to be secured.
> The Plumb plan is the best plan which has ever been devised to drive the brains out of the railroad business, to completely destroy the efficiency of operation, to cause a tremendous increase either in passenger and freight rates or in the deficit the public would have to pay, and to wreck the railroad system of the United States physically and financially. It is so preposterous in every respect that it would not merit serious discussion but for the fact that the so-called Plumb Plan League seems to be securing the support of large numbers of railroad employees who have not really informed themselves as to what the plan is and as to the way in which it would actually work.

Now, gentlemen, I have referred to these matters, not because I think they are live questions, as I know there is not a handful of men in this House who would favor either Government ownership or the Plumb plan, or anything like it; but I refer to them to show that any reasonable and generous treatment of the railroads of this country, to put them squarely on their feet and start them off under private ownership, so that they can live, would be very much more economical than any other plan, because if you do not put the railroads into the hands of their owners in a good, sound condition to start with, and with a good, sound rate system to go on with, you will certainly bring them into bankruptcy. And, if you do, you are bound to get Government ownership, and the consequent mounting costs, mounting inefficiency, and political corruption.

Now, I do not mean to go into details in this direction, because the masterly speech of our chairman this morning has given you what the committee thinks is the proper method of producing the results to which I allude. But when you come to consider the bill and some of the provisions which may be said by some here to be too favorable to the roads, just bear in mind, if you please, the conditions.

The conditions are that these roads, not by their own desire but by the exigency of war and by the operation of law, were taken over by the United States and have been run by the United States for about two years. I do not say this by way of criticism, but the fact is that the operation of the railroads by the United States has produced a great deficit. There is a continuing deficit to-day. The personnel of the roads has been disturbed. The property of the roads, in the shape of cars, is all over the United States, and it will take a large amount of time and a great amount of expense for each road to get its property together, to get its personnel together, and to go on running as a separate entity.

That is the reason why the committee has allowed this period of six months under the present guaranty, so that the roads may get new rates before the commission, and get their business started under these new rates, so that when the guaranty ends they may be on their own feet and may go on in a self-supporting way.

Now, gentlemen, something has been said here about the lack of credit of the roads. I do not mean to blame anyone if there is blame about it, but I do not believe there is any man who is familiar with finance in any way who will say that before the war the credit of the roads had not practically disappeared. Even the most prosperous of them had to raise money in the most onerous way and at a great expense. I submit to you, gentlemen, that this is not wholly a matter of statistics. The Interstate Commerce Commission produces figures to show that under their management the receipts of the roads were better than they had been before. I think those figures, while accurate in a way, do not state the whole story. But, irrespective of that—and this is what I think is the important thing for us to consider—the matter of confidence is not a matter altogether of statistics, perhaps not primarily of statistics, but what the investing public of this country see and what the general public see is that the great transportation system of this country is under the iron rule of an Interstate Commerce Commission. They saw, in the Adamson bill, the United States Congress passing a law fixing the wages and fixing the expense under which the roads must operate.

They see this expense kept on by this legislation. They see the Interstate Commerce Commission having control over their rates, so that unlike the ordinary merchant whose costs run up and who can put up his prices at once, the railroads can not promptly advance the price of their only commodity, which is transportation, and we all agree that it should not be done without supervision. But the public sees the situation. They know that politics works in devious ways sometimes, and that people and Congresses change from time to time, and they do not know to what law their investments may be subjected, and nothing is so wary as capital, whether in the hands of the large or small investor.

It seems to me that our job now is to endeavor to help this psychological situation, to legislate so that the roads may retain enough cash to go on with, and after they get started provide a proper rate structure which alone will enable them to give the public adequate service. I do not believe that there is any danger of any road being too prosperous. Gentlemen will talk about some roads paying large dividends and being very prosperous, and that these are the roads represented by the railway executives. But, gentlemen, those are the roads that carried over 90 per cent of all the ton-mileage of this country. They are the roads that do need now our fostering care. I do not believe that any man who had a large farm would say that he must neglect the good part of his farm on which his crops depend and cultivate solely the bad part. The short-line roads need our care and the bill aids them much, but the great roads on which the great transportation system of this country depends need our attention most; and I hope when this bill is passed it will be passed just as it is, and you gentlemen will feel and know that you have done to this country a great service, and have passed a great constructive piece of legislation, not primarily for the benefit of the roads but for all the people of the United States.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] referred to section 205 and made an implication that the Government stood to lose in the matter of accounting between the Government and the railroads. If the plan proposed in section 205 is adopted in the bill, is there any real danger that the Government will stand to lose anything by reason of the proposed method of settlement?

Mr. MERRITT. On the contrary, I think the Government will gain, because I think that this legislation is necessary to set the roads up; and, with the rule of rate making provided by the bill, the roads can go on and pay the Government and pay everybody else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this is the most important piece of legislation that has been before the Congress of the United States since it had up the consideration of the war resolution. We are entering now into the period of reconstruction, and this is one of the first great reconstruction measures. We had rich prairies and rich valleys waiting to be cultivated when the Pilgrims landed, but they were not cultivated until railroads came into use and the lines of railroads began to pierce those great areas, and as those railroad lines found their way across the prairies immediately villages were found all along the railway lines and the great farms began to be cultivated.

Just as England, because of her geographical location and her imperialistic government, is a great maritime nation, just so the Republic of the United States, because of its vast contiguous territory, because of its diversified industries and the necessity for a transportation system, is a great transportation country. We have one-third of the railroads of the entire world. We give the best railroad rates and we give absolutely the best service of any transportation system in all this wide world, and it has all been built up and developed by private initiative, by private capital, by private ingenuity, and private genius. And so far as I am concerned, as we enter into this reconstruction period, I want to do what is necessary to retain this great transportation system which has made us the mighty people that we are, and I do not want to adopt a policy that might lead to the destruction of its efficiency. [Applause.]

When we met in committee there were many plans proposed to us. The Plumb plan has been discussed. I do not want to rehash that plan; but, gentlemen, we ought not to pass lightly over a proposition which is seriously made to us, backed up by the considerable propaganda that is behind the Plumb plan, without letting the country know just what it means. It is not Government ownership. It proposes by some method, which I think, by the way, is unconstitutional, to take $18,000,000,000 worth of property, paying part of it by Government money, out of the hands of certain individuals and to put that property and its value into the hands of other individuals without payment on the part of the individuals into whose hands it passes. Under the plan by which these railroads are to go to this corporation for a period of a hundred years the employees and the Government are to have equally divided between them any profits that are to be made, and the profits that are to be made are the only value which the property has. The United States Government is not to get any taxes, and all the amount that it could possibly get through that plan would not amount to what it gets in taxation now, so that the beneficial interest of all that $18,000,000,000 worth of property is to be taken and turned over to somebody else.

That is not Government ownership; that is the soviet control of industry.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That plan also provided that if there were any losses the Government of the United States should pay them?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Government of the United States, of course, would have to pay them.

I want at this point to read a telegram and letter in which I have briefly given my reasons for opposing the Plumb plan:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., August 26, 1919.

HON. EVERETT SANDERS,
Washington, D. C.:

District No. 72, International Association of Machinists, in convention assembled, direct me to urge you to support the Plumb plan for the control and management of the railroads.

GEO. W. GREENLEAF, Secretary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 30, 1919.

MR. GEORGE W. GREENLEAF,
Secretary District No. 72,
International Association of Machinists,
Indianapolis, Ind.

DEAR SIR: Your telegram, as secretary of District No. 72, International Association of Machinists, relative to the Sims bill, embracing the Plumb plan of nationalization of railroads, reached me in due course, but I have not replied because the proponents of the bill had not completed their arguments in its behalf. I want to express my appreciation of your courteous telegram, for it is quite helpful to receive the views of one who has given the subject some study. In its essentials the Plumb plan is as follows:

All of the railroad properties of the country, estimated at $12,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000, are transferred for a period of 100 years from the ownership of the present holders to a corporation known as the National Railways Operating Corporation. Those of the present owners who can not be legally squeezed out are to be paid in cash, which is to be raised by means of bonds of the Government. The corporation is to be controlled and managed by a board of 15 directors, 10 elected by the classified and official employees and 5 appointed by the President of the United States. The operating income is to be applied toward the payment of the usual railroad operating expenses, including amortization and interest on the bonds. The net surplus, if any, shall remain, to be equally divided between the Government and the employees.

I might say, in passing, that the railroads and the bonds are to be entirely free from taxation, and that one-half of any amount of remaining profits will not amount in one year to as much as the Government is now receiving by way of taxation, and hence the Government will not receive as much as it is now receiving. It is expected that the lease will be renewed ad infinitum.

The mere statement of the substance of the bill is a condemnation of it. Congress may have the power by eminent domain to take the railroad properties over for the benefit of the Government, but certainly there can be no power by a roundabout way to transfer the property from one group of individuals to another group. This is not government ownership but the Russian soviet plan with slight variations. Of course the nationalization of railroads would merely be the opening wedge. Street railways, coal mines, steel mills, automobile factories, lumber mills, leather factories, clay plants, and every large industry would have to follow as a natural law of economics. In fact, the proponents of this measure recommended that this nationalization scheme be used as to other like industries whenever the employees desire.

The boards to determine the hours of labor and the amount of wages and all other kindred questions will be composed entirely of employees, one-half representing official employees and one-half representing classified employees. There is no appeal therefrom except when there is no majority decision.

There is no power in Congress under the Constitution to enact such legislation. If we had the power and should exercise it, the whole structure of the Government would fall. If $15,000,000,000 in new Government bonds are to be thrown on the market every Liberty bond would be reduced at once in value, and the holders would lose in the decreased value a billion dollars. Such an increase in credits would cause an immediate inflation; the cost of living would shoot upward with accelerating speed, and hunger, want, and untold suffering would follow. With the absolute power in the hands of employees to raise their own wages at will the cycle of high wages would immediately start. The employees of the different nationalized industries would race with each other in raising wages, a useless process, for the cost of living would always be a neck ahead. The whole Nation, with all its intricate social and economic relations, would become "jangled and out of tune" and chaos would reign supreme. I haven't the slightest doubt that a repetition of the Russian disaster would be upon us within 18 months, and the employees of the nationalized industries would, of course, be included in the mass of suffering and confused humanity.

The railroad problem is a complex and difficult one, and the rights and interest of the splendid American manhood represented by the employees constitute a prime essential in the solution. A constructive plan must be developed. We must perfect such plan upon recognized principles of equity and justice, carefully analyzing the practical effect of the legislation not only upon the hundred millions of the American people but also its effect upon the structure of the government of the great Republic under which we live.

Very sincerely, yours, EVERETT SANDERS.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to unduly criticize Mr. Plumb. I have the greatest respect and admiration for the hundreds of thousands of loyal, efficient railroad employees in this country. Mr. Plumb was employed to represent them. There was put into operation what is called "the Plumb Plan League." This league was organized, according to Mr. Plumb (hearings, p. 677), about July 1, 1919. It provided for two classes of membership. One class, consisting of local lodges and organizations, who pay $10 per year for their membership. The other class is composed of those who have individual memberships of $1 each. Mr. Plumb in his testimony said that there was probably at that time, August, 1919, an income of between $125,000 and $150,000 per annum, and that he hoped to reach $500,000 per year. The funds so raised, largely from the railroad men of the country, were used to finance his propaganda in favor of the Plumb plan.

I think it fair to assert that not 1 employee in 500 had ever thoroughly read the bill introduced embracing this plan. I do not believe that any fair-minded railroad employee who carefully read the bill and appreciated its economic effect would favor it. I have been personally told by different railroad employees that they were not in favor of the plan.

There was held out as an inducement to the employees that one-half of the profits remaining after payment of the operating expenses should be divided among the employees. This was used as a persuasive argument to enlist their support. Yet in the testimony Mr. Plumb urged, in order to induce public support, the proposition that if his plan were inaugurated railroad transportation could be carried at cost with no profit.

The great difficulty of the Plumb plan is the difficulty which attaches to any plan by which millions of employees are engaged in an occupation the benefits of which from a wage standpoint are immediately dependent upon governmental policies. To illustrate what I mean, this plan would convey to a corporation for a period of 100 years all the railroad properties of the country. It provides, however, that the employees are to have one-half the profits; by action of Congress that one-half of the profits could be changed to three-fourths or nine-tenths. Revenue could be increased from the shipping public and wages of employees could be equally increased, all dependent upon legislation passed by Congress. On the other hand, it is possible for wages to be reduced if under the Plumb plan revenues were cut down or other steps taken which would bring about that result. The effect in sum total of this scheme would be to make every railroad employee determine any action he might take as a voter upon the single standard and from the single viewpoint of his own individual interest.

This great Republic of ours has endured longer than any other Republic on the face of the earth. Those of us who found the present Government here, who found our institutions as they are, are very likely to consider our present Government with its institutions a thing to be had in perpetuity, without reference to the course the individual citizen may pursue. It must be remembered that this is a Government by the consent of the governed. The high state of governmental efficiency, which has made the Republic endure for almost one and one-half centuries, did not merely happen, but was brought about because of the high character of the individual citizen, who gave his mite as one of the governed, who shaped the destinies of the Nation.

While he has done this frequently with an eye to his individual interest, nevertheless his connection with other activities and the great diversity of his interests has made that individual citizen for these many decades add his part in the representative government in an unselfish and public spirited way. But put before the employee who is receiving $1,200 per year the proposition that by concerted action his salary may be brought up to $1,500 per year, and though he may have decided views on many other economic questions involved in a political campaign, which is the forum for determining the policy of the Government, yet no one will say that the average employee will not shape his course with the viewpoint alone of the advancement of such interests.

An illustration of this is found in the hearings on the railroad question. Mr. Plumb, in his zeal for his cause, told the committee over and over again that if the plan were not adopted the hundreds of thousands of employees interested would center their efforts in electing a Congress that would adopt those plans, and there is not one time in all the testimony of the advocates of this plan in which it ever occurred to any of the witnesses that these employees had any other interest in the great Government which has brought to them their happiness and prosperity. Mr. Plumb even went to the point of declaring that unless Congress acted in accordance with his desires that there would likely be a revolution. It is true in the hearings, after he was pressed about the matter he hedged and modified his language so as to give him a means of escape. Yet, nevertheless, everyone who was present and heard him testify knows that what he meant to convey to our committee was that there was danger of an actual revolution in the event we did not adopt the Plumb plan. I quote the following colloquy between myself and Mr. Plumb to illustrate my point and hope that you will note the different positions Mr. Plumb took on the matter, and yet I believe that no one hearing this testimony will doubt the meaning he intended to convey:

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You think that the Plumb plan is desirable for the railroad industry, and that the time is now opportune for the adoption of that plan with reference to the railroad industry?

Mr. PLUMB. I do. It is desirable, and I believe the time has come when it should be presented to the public for their consideration, because I believe it meets the demands of this occasion.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And then, in your personal opinion, that same plan is desirable for the coal industry?

Mr. PLUMB. There are many difficulties in the coal industry that distinguish that industry from this, that would make it much more difficult of application. I have not submitted and worked out a way in which it can be worked out and applied. All I can say is that I believe the principles of democracy in industry, and perhaps Government ownership should be applied to the mining industry, if those employed in the industry and the public want it so applied; but the machinery for working it out I can not possibly suggest how it should be done, because the nature of private rights in mines are so vastly different from the rights which have been granted to corporations owning the public highways.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would you subscribe to this doctrine, that all forests, mines, and waterways having national importance, should be declared national properties?

Mr. PLUMB. I subscribe to that doctrine personally, and I should like to see it subscribed to by all the people of the United States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Have you ever read the Russian Soviet constitution?

Mr. PLUMB. I have not.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That quotation that I just gave you is an extract from the Russian soviet constitution, taken from a photographic copy, which was procured by the State Department. Do you not think that the Plumb plan, rather than being a Government ownership plan, is a soviet plan?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know what a soviet plan is. I know what the popular misconception, or conception, of it may be, but I do not know what it is.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What is the popular misconception of it?

Mr. PLUMB. Well, as it is buried about in the newspapers, it seems to me the idea is that some workmen get together and go out and grab some property and divide it up between themselves.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And you think that is a misconception?

Mr. PLUMB. It must be.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If that is a misconception, what is your standard of a proper conception?

Mr. PLUMB. I would have to have information on that. I do not know.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is pretty difficult to tell what is a misconception unless you know what the proper conception is.

Mr. PLUMB. Unless you knew human nature. It is inconceivable to me that any society could believe in the right of a group—any society that was sane—could believe in the right of a group to go out and seize property and divide it up between themselves without regard to law. I can not conceive that there are people of any civilization that have such a belief.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Referring for a moment to your testimony of yesterday. In response to interrogatories propounded by Mr. BARKLEY, you explained in your testimony about a speech you made at St. Louis. What was the approximate date of that speech? My recollection is you said it was about two weeks ago.

Mr. PLUMB. I am trying to get the exact date. I think it was the 18th or 20th of July.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. To what class of persons was the address delivered?

Mr. PLUMB. It was a picnic held in some grove outside of St. Louis by several of the labor organizations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Railroad men?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Any others?

Mr. PLUMB. I was introduced to a great many men, and my recollection is that some of them were not railroad men.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You explained to them the Plumb plan at that time?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You explained that you had a plan by means of which you would take the railroad properties of the United States, amounting in actual value, in accordance with your definition of value, to about ten or twelve billions of dollars; that you would squeeze out all the holders of paper title to the property which did not represent actual value, as you defined it; that then you would make the Government purchase these properties by issuing bonds; that then you would provide under the Plumb plan to turn over for 100 years, which is a period of years longer than the lifetime of any of those employees to whom you were talking, turn this property over to a corporation, which would be, by a majority in every tribunal, controlled by them, and give them, those railroad employees, the right to a majority control, to determine the amount of their wages that should be paid, the hours of labor that they should be employed, the conditions of the labor, and that for a period of 100 years, through that corporation, they should control by majority representation the entire operation of the railroads; and that then, whatever net earnings should be left should be equally divided between them on the one hand and the Government on the other hand. And then, when you had concluded your address, had gotten through speaking, according to your testimony yesterday, crowds of men came up to you, and one of them, representing one group, said, "By G——, if we can not agree on this plan, then there is going to be revolution:" and his sentiment was echoed by all the others there.

Is that practically an accurate statement?

Mr. PLUMB. No; that is quite a long way from an accurate statement. You have paraphrased a part of the address in words which I did not use with meanings which I did not convey, and you have omitted parts which would greatly modify that paraphrase which I did use. As to the expression of the man who came to see me, as I remember it, it was "By G——, if we can not get something like this, there will be revolution."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course I do not personally recollect just what was said, but according to the reporter's notes the person came up to you and said "By G——, if we can not agree on this plan, there is going to be revolution."

Mr. PLUMB. Well, my impression is that what he said was, "We have got to get something like this; this is a way out on which we can agree, and if we do not get something like this, then we are going to have revolution."

It was an exclamation, and it was the meaning that impressed me rather than the exact words. I tried to convey that meaning to you yesterday.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It was a vigorous exclamation?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He used the term "revolution"?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What did you understand to be the meaning of the term "revolution" as used by the person who was speaking to you?

Mr. PLUMB. Well, a change in the existing order of things. There was a great deal of conversation, with a large group standing around. In my speech I told them how this plan merely carried us back to the foundations of our Government; how it restored to individuals the freedom of opportunity guaranteed by the Constitution; that it made a new order of things by evolution under the form of government established; and it drew us away from revolution. And it was in that meaning, I think, that he made this exclamation, that "here was a way out which prevents revolution."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I am anxious to know is how you interpreted his language when he said, "if we can not agree on this plan, there is going to be revolution." I want to know how you interpreted the meaning of his use of the word "revolution"?

Mr. PLUMB. An overturning of the existing industrial order and the establishment of a new one.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In other words, the overthrowing of our present form of government?

Mr. PLUMB. No. They believe that the present form of government is the means of establishing the new.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You are trying to do that by appearing before this committee and having this plan adopted, but he said the other alternative would be "revolution." You are using the peaceable plan by trying to get a plan that you think is a proper plan adopted through the regularly constituted machinery of the Government. He suggested the other plan, which was revolution. Now, how do you think he meant to accomplish that?

Mr. PLUMB. Well, I presume that these men use language forcefully. They believe in direct action and direct expression. I would not wonder very much if the revolution that we think of is the same threat that our friend from Washington believes he has received.

Mr. WEBSTER. You agree it was a threat?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEBSTER. And I certainly received it.

Mr. PLUMB. That those who are now administering the law, which these people believe is not in conformity with the Constitution, shall be replaced by men who will act in the way in which they believe the Constitution should be enforced.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You believe that is what he meant when he used the word "revolution"?

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, you will have more than that, too.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Don't you think he meant by direct action?

Mr. PLUMB. What do you mean by direct action?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What do you define as direct action, in the meaning that you give it?

Mr. PLUMB. I think the first direct action would be the use of the ballot, and that is as far as I can see it, and I hope I never will have to look beyond that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Do you think he meant to convey to you by that expression that if we did not adopt this plan by using the ballot they would have it adopted?

Mr. PLUMB. They would have what?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They would have it adopted by another Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. I think so. I am going to come a little closer to it, to what you have been trying to get, than I have given you.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I am trying to get is this: You have gone out among these people and talked with them?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And you said you wanted to bring us a message from them?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I am trying to get is what that message is.

Mr. PLUMB. It is this: We have come to a new day; we have spent our lives and our money to attain liberty; and we find that without liberty in industry we have only the shell of actual liberty to live; and they are going to get that liberty to live through the Constitution and through the lawful forces, and I hope to God it may come that way. But if the powers of reaction prevent the opportunity for that expression, then it will come in another way.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What other way?

Mr. PLUMB. In the way it always comes, through history, when reaction prevented progress.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well what do you mean by that?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think there is any doubt in your mind as to what I mean.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is no doubt in my mind as to what you meant yesterday. The adoption of the Plumb plan, through Congress, would be one way that you have described; revolution would be the other way.

Mr. PLUMB. No, Congressmen, not for a moment. The adoption of some plan that involves the new order, be it what it may. I do not care whether it is the Plumb plan or what plan it is, but some means must be devised, and we have tendered this as a possible way; and if a better way can be devised by law, accomplishing the result, you will find the most patriotic support from these same men that you could possibly ask for.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You can see the difficulty of our understanding what you mean when you use such a term as "revolution," which should not be lightly used, and I want to call your attention to the fact that Mr. BARKLEY, yesterday afternoon, asked you what you understood to be the man's meaning when he used the word "revolution," and you replied, "I think that in that man's mind and in the minds of millions of others, they feel they have reached the point of diminishing level of existence where they can not stand any more, and rather than continue to serve for diminishing returns they will cease to serve." In other words, you interpreted the word "revolution" yesterday to mean a strike, although you give it another meaning, a different interpretation, to-day. You said this: "That sentiment was echoed by all of the others." What I want to know is what the sentiment was of that body at the conclusion of your address.

Mr. PLUMB. The sentiment, as I gathered it, was that here was a real constructive effort to have established, under our Constitution, the things that they hoped for, and that a way must be shown for realizing that hope.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will adjourn at this point until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 3.30 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until Saturday, August 9, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

Irrespective of the conclusions you may have as to what was intended to be conveyed by Mr. Plumb, it nevertheless clearly illustrates that he had in his mind that these men already were going to determine their course of political action solely upon their private interests in the railroad legislation.

Mr. Plumb made a speech on September 13, 1919, at Cleveland, Ohio, at the convention of the United Mine Workers of America, in which he used the same adroit plan of saying things to convey one impression and later putting in other words to give him a loophole of escape. Listen to the language of a part of the speech he delivered there:

Now I will tell you about the plan—

Speaking of the Plumb plan—

The plan is based on those principles. We say we are going to have the Government buy these railroads. That is loose speaking. We don't have to buy the railroads, because they are already ours, and yet we have to talk in the language that is understood.

He later gave his hearers to understand that it was expected the Government would pay something of value for the railroads.

In that same speech before the miners' convention Mr. Plumb further illustrated the point I am making—the destruction of unselfish citizenship. He says:

Now, if the Congress dares deny this principle—and they will—we will have another Congress after the next election that will voice the demand of the people of the United States. Don't let that worry you.

Even the period of Government operation of railroads brought out clearly the evils of making a great body of employees directly subject to the action of governmental officials. I quote the following newspaper report of the statement by Director General William G. McAdoo, in speaking to railroad employees at a mass meeting on April 17, 1918, at El Paso, Tex.:

"The railroads must function 150 per cent, for we are not employees of the railroad companies but of Uncle Sam, enlisted in the great legion of liberty," Secretary McAdoo said. He asked the men not to become impatient because of the delay of the fixing of the new wage schedule, adding that if a raise was granted to the railroad men it would be retroactive, and they would then be able to buy Liberty bonds.

"You are all my boys, and I don't intend to let anyone kick you around, for I will defend you to the limit when you are right, and you won't go wrong, I am sure," he said.

Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a very able address by my very genial namesake from the great State of Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], who has pointed out time after time and place after place in this legislation in which we have done something of a helpful nature for the railroads, and he holds up his hands in holy horror. I might say to the gentleman that I think the great merit of this bill lies in the fact that we recognize that this Congress and the country do not want Government ownership; we know that America wants us to enact such legislation as is necessary to make private ownership a success. Why, we find these railroads with rates producing such revenue as causes a deficit of a million dollars a day. We are going to turn them back into private control. Shall we immediately put those railroads out into the market for a great deal of money in order to meet the capital expenditure that the Government has made for them, whether they wanted it or not, amounting to $1,135,000,000 altogether? Are we going to make no provision that the rates already in effect shall remain in effect until changed? If we do not, they will immediately go back to the prewar status. It will mean bankruptcy to the railroads. It will mean an industrial depression and a panic and a destruction of the financial structure of the entire country, unless we deal justly with the railroads.

I have no objection whatever to anybody criticizing this bill by saying, "Here, you are doing something which will be of benefit to the railroads of this country."

"But," says the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], "you are letting the railroads get control of the water transportation." Originally the subcommittee bill did have a provision for the control of water transportation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] made a very able speech, in which he said he wanted water transportation let alone. We struck it all out of the bill, except merely a provision where there was a joint rail and water rate. We left water transportation scot free, with no hand of regulation upon it. The steamboats can run, so far as port-to-port trips are concerned, without a single regulation with reference to rates. They can run even where they compete with the railroads. If two railroads run through competitive territory, they are regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the water lines running from port to port, competing in the same freight regions, are not touched at all.

Personally I am in favor of just the provisions that are in this bill, but if there is any criticism to be made against it with reference to water, it is that we leave the water transportation scot free while we put the railroads under regulation. I was in favor of doing that, because I want now to do everything we can to encourage water transportation, but I thought maybe we would give water transportation a little the edge of it.

The problem that confronted the committee, of course, was a simple one, so far as general outlines were concerned. It was our duty to prepare for your passage whatever legislation was necessary for the transition period between the time the railroads go back under private control and the time when a readjustment can be made.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has it been computed by the committee just what the Government loss has been since the Government took over the operation of the railroads?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think Mr. BARKLEY stated that it was something over $600,000,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. That does not include, however, the loss of interest on the revolving fund and other expenses?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. BRIGGS. That had to be met by the increase in costs, and so forth.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. I could not say just what items went into it; but we have had a big loss, and I am not going to discuss that proposition.

We provided in this bill that the present rate structure shall remain until changed. It is presumed that will take a period of six months, and the commission will have to work pretty fast to cover this whole matter in six months. During that time we proposed to continue paying the railroads by means of a guaranty the amount which they are paid at present. That is not quite an accurate statement of it. You take a six-month period for the same time of year during the three years of the test period, add the three together and divide by three, and that will be the length of your guaranty and the amount of your guaranty. During that time the State commissions can go to work on the State rates and the Interstate Commerce Commission can go to work on the interstate rates. A rate structure will then be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State commissions to meet the situation.

Many members of the committee know that personally I am rather inclined to think the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to run all of them. My work on this committee has taught me that there will never be a piece of legislation of any importance go through the House where we will all agree as to all of its provisions. After all, what we must hope to get is the best consensus of opinion about what is right and proper, and that is what we have given you in this bill; and I feel that as the committee examines it and improves it with any amendments that may be made, it will then be the expression of the consensus of the opinion of the Members of the House, and that is the best legislation which we can hope to get. It may have some inaccuracies, but we have given careful study and have made these provisions for the purpose of making private operation of the railroads a success.

We provided for refunding for a period of 10 years. That is to keep the railroads from immediately having to go into the money market. Of course, they will owe the Government. I think that was a very wise provision. We wisely provided for a $250,000,000 revolving fund for loans. We provided a manner for suits to be brought on claims growing out of Federal control. All these provisions I have enumerated are simply for the purpose of taking care of the situation which we find at the termination of Federal control.

A further part of the measure deals with an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to regulation. We have Government control by means of strong governmental regulation. If you will read the part of this bill which amends the commerce act you will find that not a single carrier can take an important step in the railroad industry without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The carriers can not put in new switches and tracks, they can not abandon tracks, they can not issue securities without the approval of the commission. The commission can upon complaint compel them to equip themselves with the facilities for transportation. It can compel one railroad to permit another railroad to use its transportation facilities.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I notice that the bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission can require the railroads to furnish cars and other equipment. Many of the short-line railroads in the country have not the cars and have not the means to get the equipment. They depend very largely on the trunk lines. Does this bill reach the short lines, and can you force them to get cars and equipment?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; but, of course, the matter lies within the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I should say, taking it by and large, that it is in favor of the short lines. The commission recognizes that all roads have not at all times the facilities, and gives them the means to get facilities.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. Does not the gentleman think that the regulation is intended to treat all shippers alike?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. Some people would get all the cars and others would get none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We have a provision in the bill for equal distribution.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does this plan provide for the car-pooling system?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; this bill does not. There is a separate bill for that. This bill has some provisions, however, for pooling arrangement.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This particular measure does not attempt to dispose of that phase of the matter?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This bill contains a very wise provision giving the Interstate Commerce Commission control over the issuance of securities. This control is exclusive and affords an adequate preventive of any watering of stock in the future.

Mr. Chairman, there are some controversial points in this bill, notably the question of a rule of rate making, the question of the adjustment of the financial relations between the carriers and the Government, and the question of added powers given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which I shall not discuss here, but shall discuss under the five-minute rule, when amendments are presented.

We have the question as to what labor provisions shall be retained in the present bill; personally I favor a provision for the machinery for voluntary adjustments between the employees and the railroads, much the same as now exists between the Railroad Administration and the railroad employees, and since I know that an amendment will be presented embracing these provisions I shall support such amendment.

I can not let this opportunity pass without emphasizing the importance of retaining the present rate structure until modified in accordance with the provisions of the law. The State rates, in my opinion, would immediately return to their prewar status unless a provision otherwise is left in this bill. The great inequality between State and interstate rates appears from the following comparison of commodity rates and class rates in Minnesota and North Dakota. I also show the comparison of class rates in Illinois and Indiana:

I am going to support the provision of this bill permitting intrastate rates to be determined primarily by the State commissions of the several States. I want to make the prediction now, however, that the time will come in the not distant future when this united country of ours will recognize the transportation question as a National and not a State question, when a closer study of the railroad rate problem, of the necessary revenue to be derived from all the roads of the country, will convince all thinking men that an adjustment of rates can not be made by 49 different tribunals, and I want to quote from Fuller on Interstate Commerce, page 57, a statement which meets my approval:

Interstate commerce has acquired a volume and importance never conceived by the authors of the Constitution. To-day interstate transactions comprise a very large proportion of the business of the country. Although the power to regulate commerce was granted chiefly as a means of protection against commercial hostilities and reprisals between the various States of the Union it remained practically dormant until comparatively recent years. It has, however, now come to be recognized as a most potent affirmative and constructive power constitutionally capable of effective development along many lines. Indeed it may be said to be the greatest power lodged in the National Government, with almost unlimited possibilities of expansion in the constantly growing field of commercial and industrial intercourse. The latest decisions of the Supreme Court point to the conclusion that whenever the Federal authority is ready to undertake the entire regulation of transportation rates it will have the power to do so, so closely interrelated are intrastate and interstate traffic. The signs point to a not distant date of unified control of the whole subject.

I hope this measure will soon pass; I hope action will soon be taken in the Senate on the bill now pending before it, and that out of the two measures there shall be evolved such legislation as will properly solve the railroad problem.

The settlement of the great areas of our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Dominion to the Gulf has been determined year after year and decade after decade by the location of the lines of transportation, until to-day they form a network of arteries through which courses the lifeblood of the Republic. The beneficent influence of our transportation system unites the areas underlaid with great beds of coal with the ore deposits of other sections. Its magic touch brings the tropical fruits of the Pacific coast and the sunny South into every village and hamlet in the land. It translates the great forests into the houses that dot the treeless prairies and make solid the long line of residences in the densely populated cities and towns. It winds through the coal fields, and before many hours have passed lighted fires bring the welcome glow to many hearthstones in far distant parts of the land. It makes possible the varied and manifold activities of our industrial business and social world.

Let us so legislate that our railroad system, the marvel and wonder of civilization, shall be brought up to the highest point of efficiency and sustained in all its vigor, and we shall then have done the greatest single act that can be done to bring to America prosperity, comfort, and happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate, and we all appreciate, that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation with which this or any Congress in the near future will have to do. In considering it I think it most important that we not only do our level best in reference to the turning back of this property to private ownership, providing the best machinery possible for the operation for the benefit of the public in the future, but I also think it is our bounden duty to provide as best we can against all possible contingencies that may have to do with hindering the operation of this property or preventing its operation.

Title II of this act attempts to deal with labor disputes and provides in a way for their consideration and settlement. It strikes me in reading the provision proposed by the committee that too little attention has been given to the interests of the public and that too much attention has been given to the operators and to the employees. The largest factor in a great measure has been entirely ignored. The interests of the public, to my mind, should be the controlling, the paramount factor in the consideration and determination of this measure.

I am not one of those ready to admit that it is impossible to find a way to settle the disputes arising between common carriers and their employees without resorting to a strike. I think that is the last measure that should be invoked for the purpose of settling these labor disputes. It will be admitted that whenever there is a strike there is a wrong, or a supposed wrong, somewhere, either on the part of the employer or on the part of the employee. We certainly can find a way better than recourse to the strike to right that wrong.

This Government thus far has been able to meet all of these great questions and to settle them satisfactorily to the great majority of those concerned. It would be a confession of weakness in our Government for us now to say that it is impossible to find a way to meet this troublesome question. I think it can be done; I think the great mass of the American people are looking to this Congress to find some way. I believe the majority of the laboring men of this country, with here and there an exception, are looking to this Congress to find some means whereby this trouble may be determined. I believe that it is to the best interests not only of the railroads but their operation in the future, and to the future interests of the public, who depend in the main upon these arteries of trade to supply their wants, that this question be determined as a part of this railroad legislation.

Now, what is the best way? Upon that proposition there may be a very great divergence of opinion. Some time ago I introduced in the House a bill, H. R. 9062, which reads as follows:

A bill to provide for the investigation of all disputes and controversies threatening the operation of the Government, intercourse between the States, or the distribution of the necessities of life.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order hereafter to more fully protect the public from actual or threatened injury arising from a want of the proper distribution of the necessities of life, whenever there shall arise a controversy or dispute respecting hours of labor, wages, or working conditions between a common carrier and its employees engaged in and providing means of commercial intercourse by rail, water, telephone, or telegraph between the States or Territories of the United States, or said States or Territories and the District of Columbia, by reason of which controversy or dispute there is in the judgment of the President of the United States good reason to believe that such controversy or dispute threatens to affect, interrupt, or prevent the civil or military functions of the United States, the movement of the mails, or the movement of food, feed, grain, produce, meats, fruits, coal, wood, or other fuel, including fuel oil, or other necessities of life, or the free and lawful movement of commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, the President may in his discretion investigate the cause and circumstances of such controversy or dispute: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to street railroads.

SEC. 2. That for this purpose the President may appoint a special commission of not to exceed five persons who, in his opinion, are eminently qualified to conduct such inquiry.

SEC. 3. That such commission shall effect its organization immediately and proceed to investigate the causes and circumstances of said controversy with all reasonable dispatch. They shall give reasonable notice to the parties to the dispute and proceed with the conduct of their inquiry at whatever place shall in their judgment be most expedient for their purpose.

SEC. 4. That the commission may adopt such rules and regulations as may seem appropriate for the direction of its inquiries, but its forms of process and the service of the same shall conform as nearly as possible to those in use by the courts of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the parties to the dispute shall be entitled to be present in person or by counsel during the conduct of the investigation and entitled to be heard, subject to such reasonable rules of procedure as the commission may adopt. The commission shall, however, be empowered to hold executive sessions for deliberative purposes and the consideration and formulation of its opinions.

SEC. 6. That in the conduct of its investigations the commission, or any single commissioner authorized by it, shall have power to administer oaths or affirmations, to sign and issue subpœnas, to require the attendance of witnesses and the taking of testimony in person or by deposition, to require the production of such books, records, and other documentary evidence as may be material and relevant for the proper determination of the subject of inquiry; whenever in the opinion of the commission it shall be necessary, the commission, or any single commissioner, or a duly authorized agent of the commission, may examine, inspect, or for that purpose require the operation or visit the place of operation where the service which is the subject matter of dispute is performed; for these purposes the commission may invoke the aid of district courts of the United States to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses, production of books, documents, and records, and may exercise in these respects the same powers to the same extent, under the same conditions and penalties, as are now vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the acts amendatory; it shall be the duty of the district courts of the United States to render said commission the same aid which, under like conditions, it is required to extend to the said Interstate Commerce Commission; and witnesses testifying before said commission shall be subject to the same obligations and entitled to like immunities as is provided in said acts.

SEC. 7. That having concluded its inquiry, the commission shall formulate its report thereon. It shall, so far as it can, declare the causes of the dispute, the parties or circumstances responsible therefor, and shall make such specific findings and recommendations as in its judgment will end the controversy and prevent its recurrence, and if, in its opinion, a legislative remedy is required, it shall make appropriate recommendations.

SEC. 8. That the report of the commission shall be made in writing to the President and by him made public and transmitted to Congress for its information and action, together with such comments and recommendations as in the opinion of the President are appropriate. At the same time, or at such time prior thereto as in the opinion of the President is advisable, said report shall be supplied to the principal parties to the controversy.

SEC. 9. That the President may fix a reasonable compensation to be paid to the members of the commission from the Treasury at such times and in such manner as he shall direct, and the commission, subject to his approval, shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties. The commission is authorized to provide itself with suitable offices and supplies, and all expenses of the commissioners, including transportation for themselves or their employees, in conducting any inquiry authorized under this act, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman and secretary of the commission.

SEC. 10. That no commission authorized under this act shall continue for a period of more than 60 days from the date of its appointment unless its continued existence is directed by Executive order.

SEC. 11. That pending the conduct and conclusion of any investigation by a commission herein authorized, the submission of its report to the President and publication of the same by him, any combination, agreement, or conspiracy by or between either or both of the parties to the controversy or dispute, or between two or more persons acting on their behalf, with their knowledge and consent, or at their instigation, to strike or lockout, or to do or refrain from doing any act or acts the necessary purpose or effect of which is to prevent, interrupt, obstruct, or interfere with the operation of a common carrier, the employees and employers of which are parties to the controversy or dispute, is hereby declared to be a felony. Any person convicted of the same shall be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than three years, or both fine and imprisonment.

It consists of 11 sections. The first and the last sections set forth the meat of this proposition. The other 9 sections, as you will observe, provide the machinery whereby it is to be put into effect. I tried to cover as nearly as I could the interests of the public, as well as the interests of the employee and the employer, providing as best I could the machinery that would settle these difficulties wisely and equitably between employer and employee and the public, thinking it would be a means whereby these troubles in the future might be ended.

I was prompted to do this first by reason of the experience this country had a number of years ago at the time Theodore Roosevelt was President of the United States, when there was a threatened strike and tie-up of the great anthracite mines in the United States. President Roosevelt, realizing that suffering would be entailed, took the matter into his own hands, and without warrant of law or statute, and said the people of this country are vitally interested and must not suffer. He sent for the mine owners and told them that the mines were not to be closed, and if they refused to operate them, if they insisted on a lockout, he would take hold of them. He sent for the workingmen and said to them that these mines must be operated, and "if you will not operate them you must get out of the way and permit somebody else to operate them that the coal may be supplied to the public."

What was the result? He appointed a commission of disinterested men for the purpose of inquiring into the disputes existing between the operators and the miners. The result was that before that commission had finally come to its determination the strike was settled, and people were supplied with all of the coal that they wanted, and it was settled, if you please, to the satisfaction of the great mass of those concerned. I have in mind that for the purpose of settling these disputes in the future the President of the United States should be empowered to appoint a committee of five men, eminently qualified for the purpose, to make an investigation into the facts and the surrounding circumstances causing that particular dispute or controversy, and that that commission shall have all of the powers of the courts, all of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the purpose of making the completest possible investigation; that during that period of time it shall be unlawful either for a strike or a lockout to occur, upon the theory that if the operator is wrong that wrong would be discovered and righted; and, upon the other hand, if the wrong lay with the workmen, that wrong would likewise be discovered and righted. In the meantime the people of the United States would not be made to suffer.

Take the bill that we have before us now; there is no reason why this sort of operating machinery should not be inserted into it. There is nothing in this bill that prevents the possibility even of a strike. If they had added, after all of the machinery, cumbrous though it may be with reference to mediation, with reference to the investigation—if they had added a clause providing that during the time that this investigation is being made, and until the report is made back to the President of the United States, the work shall continue and no strike or lockout shall be had, there would never be a strike and never a lockout, for the men appointed, even under the machinery of this bill, eminently fair, with the power to make inquiry, going to the bottom of the dispute, with the determination of doing exact justice to all, would seldom have to finish the investigation, because public opinion would decide the question before the investigation was completed, and public opinion is the deciding power after all in these great questions. We have seen evidence of that within the very last few days.

Who would be benefited by a proposition of this kind? Who would be hurt, if there was such a thing invoked? All people of this country certainly would be benefited. I maintain that the laboring men themselves who are interested would be most benefited, and in no event could they be harmed.

The only one who possibly could be damaged by reason of machinery of this character is the professional agitator. That gentleman would soon be out of a job. I know that the American workingman, whether he is engaged in a shop, a factory, or on the farm, is interested in having some kind of process whereby these labor difficulties may be determined. I believe that the great mass of the miners who were ordered out on this strike, without having any voice or vote in determining that proposition, would gladly welcome the day when there would be some kind of machinery whereby they knew that their rights would be protected to the uttermost, and whereby they would be saved from the wastefulness of these strike operations. I see by the paper that this strike, just ended so happily to-day, lasting only eight days, has cost the miners—the men who work down deep in the earth in these mines, $20,000,000—$40 apiece. What would this waste have amounted to had the strike continued for a month or two months? Not alone is the waste to the men who are thus deprived of their opportunity to work and earn but tenfold more waste may result to the producing activities of this country by reason of their being deprived of their product.

Here we are at a time when the whole world is looking to the United States for the purpose of affording the greatest possible production, at a time when the President of the United States is appealing with all of the power of his being through all of his administrative agencies for every man, woman, and child in the country to produce and keep producing more and more all of the time, and yet we are sitting here and permitting the opportunities of waste not only to continue but to grow more and more. I say that it is unbecoming in the Congress of the United States, that has with such diligence met the great problems of the past, and it is a confession that we should not subscribe to, to say that it is impossible for us to meet this thing now. I believe that if there ever was a time in the history of the legislation of the United States when the opportunity was ripe for us to provide a means whereby this wastefulness shall be saved for all the future, and whereby not only the bloodshed and riot and destruction of property that constantly is entailed by reason of these strikes may be prevented, it is now. I know whereof I speak when I speak about the wastefulness of the strikes. We have had them in my district very nearly this entire year. First the steel strike and then other strikes and then the steel strike again, when millions and millions of dollars were wasted in the idleness enforced in those mighty factory towns, when millions and millions of dollars were kept away from the men once employed in these factories, because by reason of somebody's wrong they are not permitted to work.

I have letter after letter coming to me from men in the steel industry in my district who say that they had no complaint to make either as to wages or labor conditions, but that they were forced out in obedience to this strike call. I say that such a condition is unfair to the men themselves, it is infinitely unfair to the American people, and it is unfair to the public, which we are supposed to represent here, and in whose interest we are supposed to act. We have been proclaiming that government is established for the benefit of all the people, and we have been legislating or professing to legislate for the masses and not for the classes. A great many years ago the autocracy of capital asserted itself in this country, when the owners of the railroads of the country sought to exploit them and did exploit them for individual gain. It remained for the Congress of the United States, after a long trial, to enact laws to convince the men who were the owners of these railroads that they were mere agents serving the public and that their instrumentality was an instrumentality that belonged, for use at least, to the public, established for the purpose of serving the public, and that it would be controlled in the interest of the public.

It is just as essential, it occurs to me, to provide for the operation of these railroads uninterruptedly as it is essential for us to provide the manner in which they shall be operated and the conditions under which they shall be operated. It is just as essential for the American people, who are so vitally interested in this legislation, to know not only that the engines are to be supplied for the purpose of running and the tracks are to be kept in good condition, but also that the men who are on the engine and cars, who are attending to the track or wherever they may be, shall function, and also to know and rest serene in the satisfaction of knowing that there is a measure provided by law where exact justice will be done to the laboring man who works upon the track, that exact justice will be done to those who are engaged either in its operation, in its maintenance, or in the furnishing of capital to it. Provision should be made so that the man who invests a dollar in the capital stock of the railroads of this country will not lose it. The public is likewise interested in knowing that when a laboring man is doing his work that he is getting a just return for his labor and that he will be permitted to work under labor conditions that should be provided for human beings. We are likewise, and the public is, vitally interested in knowing that when those conditions are furnished this work will be done, and that in the event that there is a dispute or in the event that there is a controversy that there is some machinery of law without reference to a mob or riot whereby these disputes may be determined for the benefit not only of those who are immediately concerned but for the benefit of the entire public.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman is striking what to my mind is one of the weak points in this present bill. The gentleman's contention practically is in favor of compulsory arbitration. As against that contention it is stated that it would be unconstitutional to restrict the right to strike by compulsory arbitration. What does the gentleman say in answer to that contention?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not take any stock in that contention. I am of the opinion that if the United States Government has the right and authority to take over an agency that it has the right and authority to take and operate that agency, and in doing so to use such means as may be necessary for that purpose, and that under the police power they have the right to do that thing. This is not private property, it is a quasi public property, operated, if you please, with the sanction of the Government and can only be operated by the sanction of the Government and for the purpose of serving the public. It is therefore surrounded by this police power and authority that is directly given to the Government for this purpose of protecting its sovereign rights.

Mr. STEELE. In support of the gentleman's view, is not that substantially what the Supreme Court stated in settling the Adamson law?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely the same thing, not only in settling the Adamson law but in the Debs case as well, so there is no validity in that contention. Now, then, gentlemen, it strikes me that now is the time, not to wait until after a while when it may be too late for us to act before dire calamity may fall upon the country. I believe that the laboring men of this country are just as patriotic as the capitalists of this country. I believe they are just as desirous of doing their full measure of duty as anybody else is. I say it would be a slander and a reflection upon a man who handles the throttle upon an engine or who works anywhere else to say that he is not actuated with the same patriotism and honest impulses that the man who owns that railroad is actuated by, and therefore I believe that here is a possibility whereby the American Congress through its judicious action can take and forever settle this question and bring about a better understanding, a better feeling among those who are the employed and those who are the employers. It is up to us, and the time is now ripe for such action. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise pursuant to the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10453, had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing under the rule a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on Senate 425, an act to establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah.

The SPEAKER. Ordered to be printed under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to an act (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "under which name the aforesaid national park shall be maintained by allotment of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the national monuments, until such time as an independent appropriation is made therefor by Congress"; and the House agree to the same.

N. J. SINNOTT,
ADDISON T. SMITH,
JAS. H. MAYS,
Managers on the part of the House.

REED SMOOT,
ALBERT B. FALL,
HENRY L. MYERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The effect of the change agreed upon in conference is to strike from the House amendment the following language: "provided alienated land shall be acquired in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior at a cost of not more than $5 per acre."

There are only 80 acres of alienated land in the proposed park.

It is not desired to purchase said land.

N. J. SINNOTT,
ADDISON T. SMITH,
JAS. H. MAYS,
Managers on the part of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. GALLIVAN was granted leave of absence for five days on account of the death of his brother.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by Mr. LEA of California at the dedicatory services held to-day in La Fayette Park at the planting of some California redwood trees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on a nonpolitical subject, on the subject of the anniversary of the signing of the armistice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of extending my remarks on the industrial situation in the South.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair designates to preside this evening Mr. MONDELL, of Wyoming.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the Speaker prepared to take up the matter?

The SPEAKER. There is on the calendar by accident a report from the investigation of the election in the fifth Missouri district that contains a report that required no action. The Chair thinks it is improperly on the calendar, and, without objection, it will be stricken from the calendar and laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, under the rule the House stands at recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MONDELL.

FILING OF MINORITY VIEWS.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. I desire to inquire whether a report has gone into the basket during the day on House resolution 381, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], chairman of the Special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that such a report has been deposited in the basket.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know just precisely what course to pursue under that statement. The rules of the House provide that reports of a committee, together with the views of the minority, shall be printed. It was my understanding that the report of the committee before being introduced would be submitted to me. I may be in error in my recollection, but that was my understanding. So, it seems the only thing I can do now is to ask unanimous consent—which was not submitted—for a certain time in which to file minority views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair may suggest, will the gentleman be good enough to withhold his request until a little later and submit it again this evening?

Mr. GARRETT. I will be very glad to do that, except I do not wish to lose my right to file minority views. I am embarrassed in this matter, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will not lose his rights, and it is possible that in the meantime we can have an explanation of the situation, which does not appear to be clear to the gentleman. The Chair knows nothing of the circumstances.

Mr. GARRETT. I realize that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recognized before adjournment, if he desires to be.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended; and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how the time stands now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has used 3 hours and 47 minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin 3 hours and 52 minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has held extended hearings on the railway problem that confronts the country. Many plans for the reorganization of the method of operating and maintaining our great lines of transportation were submitted for our consideration. The men who presented and argued the plans displayed great ability, and I am sure it was evident to every member of the committee that they had spent an unusual amount of time in careful and painstaking research and study in their preparation.

These plans embrace almost every phase of the stupendous questions involved in the varied relations between capital and labor, private and Government ownership of property, private and public management of property, and the policy to be pursued by our Government with reference to the great transportation systems of the country.

I believe it is plain to every thoughtful man that we are at the threshold of a new era in the economic, industrial, social, and governmental life of the Republic.

Things are in a chaotic condition throughout the world, and whatever plan or method is finally adopted by Congress will probably be in operation for the next half century.

The adoption of a wrong policy might eventually threaten the existence of the Republic. The rights of the wage earner, the investor, and the general public should receive due recognition and protection. In my judgment the adoption of a definite policy by the Government toward the transportation lines of the country is not only desirable, but is mandatory, and would in a great measure do away with the universal unrest throughout the country, and have a tendency to steady and stabilize all business conditions.

In approaching the subject before us, then, it might be well at the outset to examine into the fundamental principles involved in these important questions, as set forth by the framers of our form of government and which we find embodied in the Constitution of the United States.

Many writers on government have confounded property rights with the principles of free institutions. While they are somewhat involved, they are different. The one relates to the ownership of property—its possession and its transfer. The other relates to the individual and the duty of one to the other.

The one has to do with the affairs of business. The other with the responsibilities of government.

The one pertains to our wants. The other to our security.

The one tends to safeguard our means of existence. The other insures our freedom and preserves our liberties.

The one pertains to the restraint of our greed and avarice. The other gives scope to our individualism, ideals, and better impulses.

The one relates to material things in which individual possession is possible. The other relates to things which can not be possessed by any individual but which all persons share and enjoy alike, such as good will, spirituality, mental operations, freedom.

The one springs from the promptings of our baser natures, and is of the earth earthy. The other draws inspiration from and finds its counterpart in the laws of the universe. These distinctions run through all nature.

The one finds exemplification in the life of John D. Rockefeller. The other is typified in the life of Abraham Lincoln. The one spent his life accumulating property and protesting against the restraints of government. The other dedicated his services to the cause of humanity and was a careful interpreter of the principles of free institutions.

If the principles of free institutions are in the ascendency, if the rights of the individual are kept uppermost by the people, then the tendency is toward a democratic or republican form of government, the ultimate purposes of which are the greatest good to the greatest number. If the acquisition of property gains a mastery over the minds of men, then the tendency is toward greed, tyranny and oppression and a monarchial form of government, where the rights of the many are subservient to the domination of the few.

We as a free people are tending one way or the other. Nothing in this world can pause or stay. There is unceasing change everywhere.

The question naturally arises, Which way are we tending as a people? Have we thus far observed the foregoing distinctions in the conducting of our business relations and in the administration of the affairs of our Government?

Shall we as a nation embark on a policy of managing and operating business, or shall we continue to control and regulate it?

Shall we turn our Government into a great business concern in the modern acceptance of that term?

Shall we cling to the fundamental principles of free institutions which guided the framers of our Constitution or in the present extremity shall we depart therefrom?

I shall not discuss the foregoing questions separately, but I shall treat them as a whole, for, in fact, they all pertain to one proposition.

Our fathers, when they founded the Government under which we are living, recognized the foregoing distinctions and understood these questions as well and better than we do now.

The framers of the Constitution treated the following propositions, among others, as fully established:

1. Every man is free in the exercise of his religion. The eternal divorcement of church and state.

First amendment to the Constitution:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

2. Free speech and liberty of the press.

First amendment to the Constitution:

Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

3. The rights of property being inviolable and sacred, no one ought to be deprived of it, except in case of evident public necessity, legally ascertained, and on condition of previous just indemnity.

Fifth amendment to the Constitution: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Fourteenth amendment to the Constitution: "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

As stated before, the above propositions were considered as established by the framers of the Constitution. The first two propositions are simply cited here for the purpose of comparison. They have been faithfully observed by Congress and stand as the unquestioned law of the land, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto.

The third proposition recognizes beyond question the right of the individual to own and enjoy property and the fruits of his toil, and make such disposition of his possessions, capital, income, and industry as he chooses.

It recognizes the right of every citizen to engage in any kind of labor, commerce, or agriculture; he can manufacture, sell, and transport every species of production.

When the Constitution and the first 10 amendments were adopted all the property located in the several States was owned and controlled by the several States or the people. All questions in regard to property and property rights were left to the several States, or the people, except in so far as it might be necessary to acquire property in the ways and for the specific purposes enumerated in the Constitution.

What are the provisions in the Constitution in regard to the acquisition of property?

1. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

2. The Congress shall have the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

3. The Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin.

4. The Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads.

5. The Congress shall have the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, and arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings.

6. The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory and other property belonging to the United States.

7. All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The laws of the several States are supreme as to property and property rights, except as to the powers granted to Congress as set forth above.

It must be observed that the framers of the Constitution in granting the above-mentioned powers to the Federal Government did not contemplate the purchasing of property except for the purpose of exercising the functions of government and promoting the general welfare through the powers specifically granted to Congress.

To levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to borrow money, to coin money, to establish post offices and post roads, to accept cessions of particular States as a location for the seat of government, and to exercise authority over all places for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States, to lay and collect taxes on income from whatever source derived, are all "Government functions."

While borrowing money is not exclusively a Government function, yet as used in the Constitution it pertains wholly to governmental affairs as distinguished from ordinary business.

It is plain that the framers of the Constitution did not in any manner contemplate the purchasing of property for the purpose of operating, conducting, managing, and establishing a "business concern."

There was no thought of profit or the accumulation of property for property's sake. They were dealing solely with the necessities of government, viewed from the standpoint of the general welfare of the people as manifest through the proper exercise of governmental functions.

The word "business" is here used in the modern acceptance of that term as applied to financial and commercial enterprises.

I lay down this proposition, then, that the framers of the Constitution did not in any manner contemplate the establishment of a "business concern" when they drafted the Constitution and gave us the form of government under which we live.

In other words, they rigidly adhered to the doctrine, render unto business the things that pertain to business and unto government the things that pertain to government. [Applause.]

What other evidence have we that this proposition is in harmony with the views of the makers of the Constitution?

Let us turn to the preamble:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

You will observe that the Constitution is for the United States of America; not of the United States of America.

There is no such thing as the idea of a compact between the people on the one side and the Government on the other. The compact was that of the people with each other to produce and constitute a government.

There is nothing in the preamble which refers to managing and conducting and operating a business. The handling, carrying on, operating, and management of business was left to the several States or to the people thereof.

The United States Government only has the powers granted it by the several States.

The Constitution and the amendments thereto are the embodiment of all the powers and authority that can be exercised by the United States Government. All other powers were reserved to the States or to the people.

The tenth amendment to the Constitution:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

The framers of the form of government under which we live were not organizing a "great business concern" but a Republic. Let me repeat, they were organizing a Republic and not a democracy.

I am aware that to many this will be a startling assertion, due to the fact that for the last 20 years or more the word "democracy" has been indiscriminately and improperly used by many men of note in referring to our form of government.

Lincoln in his letters and public utterances in discussing governmental affairs seldom, if ever, used the word "democracy." In his Gettysburg address he stated, in part, as follows:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

In another part of the address he stated—and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

He referred to it as being a government of the people, and the manner in which it was conceived and formed by our fathers, but he did not refer to it as a democracy.

The Constitution also in express language guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government. Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution is, in part, as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

The government of every successful business enterprise is, in fact, if not in form, a monarchy or oligarchy. It is constructed from the top downward. It has for its objects the accumulation and the management of property. It has to do with property rights. The executive, legislative, and judicial powers are vested in one man or set of men. This, of necessity, must be so in order that there may be efficient business management. This thought has been crystallized in the organization of private corporations for pecuniary profit, all of which derive their power and authority from the several States, except in a few instances corporations have been authorized by an act of Congress.

Examine into any great business and you will find somewhere a master mind—a king, if you please—directing and managing its affairs. You will find it under one supreme will, or the supreme domination of a few kindred spirits, who are autocrats in their line.

The fathers constructed our Government from the bottom upward. It was based on the consent of the governed. They violated all the principles which underlie the organization of a successful business.

They were dealing with the principles of free institutions and not with property rights, only in so far as they might affect the general welfare of the people. The ownership of property and property rights were reserved to the States or to the people except in so far as it might be necessary to exercise the functions of government.

Our Federal Government consists of three branches—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. These three branches were to be kept as distinct as possible.

Jefferson said:

That instrument—

meant that its coordinate branches should be checks on each other.

If they had been organizing a business concern, they would not have made these divisions. A successful business organization is a monarchy in form, and these three branches must be vested in one man or set of men acting in unison and harmony. There must be concentration of power in order to have effective business management. That which is everybody's business is nobody's business. Successful business will not tolerate delays. Promptness of action and decision is absolutely necessary to efficient management. This, of course, does not of necessity preclude an arrangement whereby a person or persons employed by a business concern may share in the profits or earnings, if any, growing out of a business, and thus receive the compensation to which they are justly entitled by reason of their cooperation, skill, and industry.

When the framers of the Constitution organized our Government they were not looking to the acquisition of property for a business concern. In fact, they did not have any property to begin with; neither did they have in mind the acquisition of property—only in so far as it might be necessary to exercise the true functions of government.

Business, fundamentally, stands on three legs—capital, labor, and management. Experience has demonstrated beyond all cavel that the Government can obtain capital and employ labor, but it can not furnish efficient management. Business concerns can obtain capital, employ labor, and can furnish proper and efficient management.

Capital, labor, and management—and the greatest of these, viewed from a successful business standpoint, is management. If any one of these three is lacking, the structure must inevitably fall. Some writers have asserted that 95 per cent of business success is dependent upon management.

The organic structure of free institutions precludes the securing of competent and efficient management, for, primarily, it has to do with the government of peoples whose consent must be first obtained through slow, devious, and uncertain methods.

The organic structure of a successful business concern inherently contains all the essential elements of good management, for it primarily deals with property, and the will and commands of the financial head must be obeyed.

These two forms of government are in irreconcilable conflict and have been since time began.

The one pertains to property rights, the other to the principles by which a free people are governed. If it is our purpose, then, to turn our Government into a great business concern, we must organize along business lines. If the Government is to be swallowed up by business, we must retrace our steps along the dusty highway over which our forefathers marched in triumph and with popular approval. We must resort to taxation on a more extensive scale to make up deficits created by slothful Government management. If we wish to keep it a republic, if we wish to preserve the Constitution, we must cling to the fundamental principles enunciated and adhered to by its founders.

Do not misunderstand me. We must regulate and control these so-called business monarchies. We must not allow our Government to become imbued with the spirit of these institutions and thus gradually merge into an autocracy. We must not allow creatures of the laws of the several States to become greater and more powerful than the Federal Government. They must not be superior to their creators.

In our desperation we must guard against acting unwisely, for we can not afford to even compromise with them, when a fundamental principle of government is involved. Our forefathers compromised with slavery and it took a Civil War to right the wrong.

The Government of the Republic and the management of great business concerns must each remain in their own appointed spheres, as precisely and constantly as the planets keep to their orbits. We exist under government; we live by industry.

At all times and under all circumstances we should keep in mind the purposes for which our Government was organized, as set forth in the preamble to the Constitution—

> To form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

The history of this country has shown that these business monarchies are of short duration. They have usually been built up and around the life of an individual or a number of kindred spirits. When the king dies, so to speak, the property he has accumulated is usually dissipated or divided among those who are legally entitled thereto. In this country we have no primogeniture.

Most of the men who have accumulated fortunes in this country started poor, and their grandchildren usually spend that which their grandfathers accumulated through great industry, perseverance, and self-denial. It is usually accomplished in three generations. The coddled sons of the rich are not a match for the aggressive sons of the ordinary man.

Monarchies in government, as well as in business, usually die with the reigning house. Republics are a happy medium between tyranny and chaos, and so long as they exercise only the functions of government and keep in mind the principles of free institutions we have every reason to believe their existence will be perpetual. All nature sanctions this conclusion, for it is the doctrine of the happy medium.

When George Washington died he was the richest man in the Republic. It is estimated that his fortune amounted to about $500,000. It has been distributed. It is not intact to-day.

Business fortunes in this country are continually being accumulated and dissipated. The careers of many of our successful business men are now but a tradition while our Republic has survived unimpaired, and in my judgment it will continue to do so if we rigidly adhere to the principles promulgated by its founders as set forth in the Constitution. [Applause.]

In order that I may not be misunderstood, I wish to state that I am not one of those who contend that the Constitution should not be amended at times. To do so would be to deny that progress can be made and conditions bettered. A people always have the right to review, reform, and change their constitution. Our Constitution provides for amendments. One generation has not the right to subject future generations to its laws.

Our Government has been in existence for over 130 years, and has served as a model for many peoples striving to work out improvements in governmental affairs. It has been admired by the lovers of liberty everywhere.

My contention is that a government that has worked so well and has been so beneficial to mankind should not be fundamentally changed, unless the evidence for the proposed change when fairly weighed is clear and the argument in its favor convincing and logical.

Thus far the discussion has largely been confined to the construction to be placed upon the Constitution and the amendments thereto.

I shall now review briefly our history for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, whether as a Nation for over 130 years we have pursued the policy mapped out by the fathers for the administration of governmental affairs. In doing so I shall ask you to keep in mind at all times that our Government was not organized for the purpose of conducting, operating, and managing a "business concern" in the modern acceptance of that term. Have we kept faith with the fathers of the Republic? Has the Constitution been to us a pillar of fire by night and a cloud by day?

When we declared our independence the Confederacy did not own any country. The several States owned all the country. Their boundaries were not where they are now. The first territory owned by the Federal Government came from the State of Virginia and was known as the Northwest Territory.

The first Congress in 1789, which sat under the Constitution, passed laws for its government. A policy was immediately instituted for the settlement of this Territory, and people from the thirteen States were encouraged to go there. Congress from time to time made provision for the admission of new States into the Union. The States of Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, and part of the State of Ohio were formed out of this Territory. The land and all its resources, generally speaking, were divided among the people, and each State was guaranteed a representative form of government. These States were placed upon the same basis as the thirteen original States, so far as property and property rights were concerned. The public domain was distributed among the people without reservation and for nominal sums. The Federal Government did not do this for profit or as a business concern, but for the purposes set forth in the preamble to the Constitution.

The State of Kentucky was formed out of territory ceded to the Federal Government presumably by the State of Virginia. The State of Tennessee was formed out of territory ceded to the Federal Government by North Carolina. The States of Mississippi and Alabama were formed out of territory ceded to the Federal Government by the State of Georgia. In all these instances the land and the resources were distributed among the people, and each State was granted a republican form of government.

The individuals who obtained this land derived absolute title from the Government. The taxes paid by the owners went to the municipalities, townships, counties, or States, and not to the Federal Government. The Government was not running or managing a business concern in dealing out all of this land.

In 1803 the Federal Government purchased from France what was then known as the Louisiana Territory. It included the present States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, all of Oklahoma, part of Montana, Wyoming, and Colorado. At the time of its purchase a grave question arose as to whether or not the United States had authority under the Constitution to purchase territory from a foreign power.

The language of the Constitution in regard to territory belonging to the United States is, in part, as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

In other words, the Government did not have express power to purchase territory from a foreign power because the authority granted in the Constitution simply referred to "territory or other property belonging to the United States."

President Jefferson realized that in negotiating for this territory—Louisiana Territory—and making provision for its purchase he, as President, had no express constitutional authority.

In a letter addressed to Mr. Breckinridge, who was Attorney General in President Jefferson's Cabinet, in discussing the purchase of this territory, he made the following statement:

> But I suppose they must then appeal to the Nation for an additional article to the Constitution, approving and confirming an act which the Nation had not previously authorized. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory, and saying to him when of age, I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you; you may disavow me and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty to risk myself for you. But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution by more strongly marking out its lines. (Jefferson's Works, vol. 4, pp. 500, 501.)

The land within the borders of the State of Florida was ceded to the United States by Spain in 1819—100 years ago.

The land comprised within the borders of the State of Texas was annexed to the United States in 1845.

The Oregon Territory, the title to which was established in the United States in 1846, now comprises the States of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and a part of Wyoming and Montana.

In 1848 Mexico ceded to the United States the territory out of which was carved a part of the States of New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona and the States of California, Nevada, and Utah.

In 1853 we purchased of Mexico the territory which is now included within the borders of the States of Arizona and New Mexico. This was known as the Gadsden purchase.

In all these instances, in acquiring this property, it must be observed that the object and purpose of the United States Government was not to establish a business concern.

All this territory once owned by the United States has been formed into separated States, and each State has been granted a republican form of government. The land and the resources of all this territory has been largely divided among the States or the people thereof.

Large tracts of our western land were turned over to certain railway companies in order that our transportation facilities might be improved, but the Government has never attempted to permanently operate the railways because of that fact.

The land was given to them outright, with perhaps the exception in some instances of reservations in regard to minerals and oil.

It may be contended that we are now operating a railroad in Alaska, which, in a measure, is true. And yet in the act to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska it is provided for the leasing and disposition of the same.

The Government has not inaugurated a permanent policy toward the railroads of Alaska, and if Alaska ever becomes a State of the Union I venture the assertion that the railways of Alaska will be turned over to private ownership, operation, and management.

The whole trend of our history has been to guard against the Government of the United States engaging in business. Congress has studiously avoided embarking upon any business enterprise. The management and operation of business concerns has been left to the States or the people thereof.

The present railway bill that we are now considering is constructed in accordance with the traditions of the Republic and in harmony with the provisions of the Constitution, thus keeping in mind that the framers of that instrument never in any manner contemplated that the United States Government should ever be turned into a great business concern. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY], a member of the committee.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was pleased beyond expression when I read in this afternoon's paper that the miners' strike had been called off, and I was especially pleased at the statement issued by Mr. Lewis, the acting president of the United Mine Workers, which I want to read into the RECORD, as follows:

> Gentlemen, we will comply with the mandate of the court. We do it under protest. We are Americans. We can not fight our Government.

What stronger evidence than this can there be, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of the loyalty and patriotism of the workers of this country? [Applause.] Unquestionably, they have respect for law and authority. I believe we have treated them fairly in this bill. We have sought to be fair not only to them but to the employers of labor.

One of the distinguished members of our committee, my colleague [Mr. WINSLOW], himself a large employer of labor, said that whenever he had any difficulties with the men in his employ he never failed to iron out and settle those difficulties when, as he expressed it, "He got them around the mahogany and rubbed noses with them." That is what we want to do with the laboring men of this country to-day—get them around the table, rub noses with them, and talk with them. Good results are sure to flow from an honest and frank interchange of opinions.

There are radical elements in some of the organizations, but I do not believe such elements are in control. Radical elements in every organization, as a rule, are composed of the loud-mouthed men, the men who make the most noise. But, after all, I have an abiding faith in the common sense and good judgment of all of the people of this country, the workers as well as the employers.

I listened with a great deal of interest to-day, and a great deal of pleasure, to the eloquent speech made by my friend and colleague on the committee, Gov. SANDERS, of Louisiana. I think he is unduly alarmed about the effect of this bill on water transportation. If you will read the bill you will find that such transportation is specially exempted. I shall not attempt to answer him any further, because his namesake, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], I think answered his argument completely.

The railroads were taken over by the Government only because of the emergencies growing out of the war. The Federal control act expressly declared that it was emergency legislation, and it was not to be construed as either expressing or prejudicing the future policy of the Government regarding public ownership of the railroads.

Every thinking man knows, however, that their economical and successful operation would have resulted in a demand for Government ownership and operation, not only from those who always favored it, but also from the general public, who are interested in obtaining such plan of control and operation that promises the best results.

The overwhelming sentiment of the people is for the immediate return of these vast properties to their owners for their private operation, due to the failure of the present operation. This failure, however, is not due to any inefficiency of management, but to the inherent weakness of governmental operation. I do not believe that the people ever wanted public ownership, and their experience since the roads were taken over has strengthened their conviction in this regard.

Government ownership and control are not in the real interest of the shippers, employees, or general public. They tend to destroy private enterprise and initiative. Private ownership and management, with strict but fair governmental supervision and regulation, will conduce to the best interests of the people and the railroads, provided, of course, the roads are accorded and encouraged by better treatment than they have heretofore received. Experience has demonstrated the wisdom of such a policy.

The bill, H. R. 10453, presented by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has been framed only after extended hearings and after a full and exhaustive discussion by the committee of all phases of the important questions it seeks to settle. I believe it is a good bill, and I shall support it.

In addition to the section dealing with disputes between the carriers and their employees there are two other important matters dealt with, namely, the refunding of the indebtedness of the railroads to the United States and the matter of rate making.

The provision written in this bill for refunding the indebtedness of the roads to the Government arising out of transactions during Federal control is not only fair to the carriers, as it should be, but it is absolutely necessary if we do not want to see some of them badly crippled and others driven to the wall.

It would be unfair and would seriously impair the stability of the roads to force them to pay at once to the Government the money advanced for additions and improvements. It is out of the question for them to do this and to meet their ordinary operating charges and expenses.

And to cripple the roads would be a serious thing for the country and its industries.

In this connection we must not lose sight of the fact that when the roads go back to those who own them they will be burdened with expenses far in excess of those under private control, due to increased wages and the high cost of materials.

Now, as to rates and rate making, the railroad companies are entitled to a fair and adequate return for the service they perform; and the shipper and people are entitled to good service and the assurance that they are to be charged for such service only what it is reasonably worth. The provisions of this bill take care of both these matters. We want to see the carrier prosper. Unless it does, it can not give good and efficient service to the public and the shippers and pay its employees the wages to which they are entitled. I believe the public is willing to pay rates adequate for this, and I am convinced all this can be accomplished without imposing more than fair and equitable rates.

Rates must be sufficient to enable the railroad to continue, to keep its credit, to attract new capital, improve, and expand. The public interests require this.

America has the greatest and best railroad system in the world. The roads of no other country are in the same class with ours.

Let us maintain their high standard of service, and this we can do only by passing legislation designed to help and not destroy them.

The Cummins amendment to the commerce act changed the law affecting the liability of a water carrier. This law had been on our statute books for many years. I was told by Senator CUMMINS it was not his intention to repeal this old statute which confines the liability of the carrier to the value of the vessel and the money derived from the freight. In this bill we amend the Cummins Act so as to restore the old marine statute I have just referred to.

We have been fair to the so-called short-line railroads, which have complained that they have not received fair treatment from the trunk-line roads in a division of through rates.

We give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix such a division on its own initiative. These small roads should get fair and considerate treatment in division of joint through rates. They should be encouraged. They help in the development of the country and they stimulate traffic. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it undoubtedly sounds like a truism to say that the bill now under consideration is perhaps one of the most important that this Congress will have in contemplation of passage. The importance of the bill arises from various circumstances. When the Government took under its control the transportation systems of the country, it was a matter of urgent necessity, and even then it was a matter of doubtful expediency, so far as profit was concerned, and the result has shown that instead of being profitable, it was a dead loss to the Government. Therefore, from a financial point of view, it is absolutely necessary that something be done either to keep on with Federal control under different circumstances and perhaps enlarged supervision, or it becomes necessary to return these roads to private ownership with increased supervision on the part of the Government through the Interstate Commerce Commission. That feature of importance, of course, we all recognize. Then there are other matters of great necessity which must impel every thinking man in the consideration of this bill to take them under consideration. The transportation system is akin to the arteries and veins in the human body, these lines are the circulating medium of commerce; and if they be impeded or broken, commerce either stops or is so impeded that the great public is damaged thereby, and therefore the interests of 110,000,000 people are at stake with regard to this piece of legislation.

Now, those 110,000,000 people consist of various elements. The public at large, of course, includes them all. But we have 2,000,000 workmen on these railroads, and this constant demand for higher wages by the employees of the various transportation lines constitutes a question which is constantly agitating the Congress, and constantly disturbing the business interests of the country. That should be settled, and settled definitely, if we are to have business prosperity and business soundness. Then the shippers of this country, almost countless in numbers, have their great interests to be considered, and correlative with the shippers are the consumers of the products which they ship.

Then added to that is the Government itself. Regardless of the fact that it represents the great population of 110,000,000, the Government itself, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has regulated and supervised this transportation system for a number of years, and the question has always been and is now whether that supervision should be extended, revised, made more lax, or made more imperative. And then added to all these features that I have tried to suggest to this committee is another great feature, and that is the financial interest of this country. And when I speak of the financial interests I do not mean Wall Street; I do not mean those engaged strictly in the buying and selling of railroad securities. I mean the people who own the stock and bonds of the various railroads, because in large measure the prosperity of the people in this country is dependent upon the stability of those very issues of stocks and bonds, and therefore it becomes necessary in the consideration of this measure to determine if possible how this stability can be secured, and if it has deteriorated how it can be promoted and made more secure.

Now, this bill, in my humble judgment, meets in large measure these various circumstances that I have tried to portray to you; and in passing let me say this—and I am quite sure, although I am a member of the minority side of this committee, that I voice the unanimous sentiment of the committee in the opinion—that the labors of the chairman and of the gentlemen who collaborated with him as members of the subcommittee have been so urgent, have been so sincere, not only as to time but as to energy, and the results to the committee itself have been so satisfactory, that unbounded, unstinted praise should be given to Chairman ESCH and the gentlemen of the subcommittee. [Applause.]

There are certain features of this bill that do not meet the unanimous approval of the committee. There is room for honest difference of opinion. But, taken as a whole, the structure, whilst it may not be a complete and satisfactory solution of the problem, goes in great measure to establishing what I believe to be the soundness of purpose and stability in regard to the management of the railroad transportation of the country.

In order that one might lucidly explain the provisions of this bill, more time should be given than I have requested, and I know too well the temper of this House to endeavor in any way to tire it by a prolix or a lengthy discussion either of the merits or of the supposed demerits of the bill. But there are certain outstanding features in the bill which to my mind are the pivotal things in it—those which should command, and I think will command, the most earnest attention of the House sitting in the Committee of the Whole.

Now, what are those outstanding features? First, we establish in this bill what is called a guaranty fund. What do we mean by a guaranty fund, and why should there be a guaranty? Anyone who knows anything about the situation, although he may perhaps be blind to the present emergency and necessity, if he has read and studied and observed with an impartial mind, must come to the conclusion that the transportation systems of the country, if they be returned on the 1st day of January next, are bound of necessity to require help. That arises from the fact that their organization has been disturbed; their transportation system has been diverted; short lines have been mingled with trunk lines; traffic has been diverted from one system of short lines to another, occasioned by the necessities of the Government during the war period; the official forces of the various railroad companies have been changed from time to time; superintendents of this or that division have been relegated to a different portion of the country, or perhaps to a different portion of the system itself—and all this requires reorganization. We know, too, that great betterments and improvements have been made from time to time at the behest and dictates of the Government, occasioned by the war necessity, and this has entailed a large amount of expense upon the railroad companies themselves. And therefore it becomes absolutely necessary, unless there be an immediate change of the rate system—enlarging the rates, increasing them—that these railroads shall have something to depend upon during a period, perhaps, as we stated, for at least six months after the termination of Federal control.

Therefore we have established in this bill what we call a guaranty fund. Now, what is the guaranty fund? It provides that for a period of six months after the termination of Federal control there shall be paid to the various railroad companies, if they desire to avail themselves of it, the standard return as established during the test period, which time, however, expires on June 30, 1917, being the years during which the test period, as we call it, is to be formed. Now, the test period consists of three periods of six months, which are the corresponding six months severally mentioned, in the time during which the guaranty is to be sought or obtained by the various railroad companies. Therefore we start out with this proposition, that when Federal control ceases, if it does cease on the 1st day of January, 1920, these railroad companies will be assured, if they desire to avail themselves of it, of a guaranty of the standard return as fixed by the test period of three several six months, corresponding to the time during which they request it, of the standard return as established during the time prior to June, 1917. I take it that nothing could add more to the stability of business; nothing could assure the public more earnestly of the intent of Congress to make certain that the railroad companies will not be obliged either to go into the hands of receivers or to labor under distressing circumstances during this preliminary period of six months. Some of the gentlemen in the committee argued and some of the railroad officials argued that the time was not long enough. Others, again, argued that it was too long, and others took the ultra view that there should be no guaranty at all. The committee, either in their wisdom or perhaps in their discretion, if we call it by a milder name, sought the middle ground and established this guaranty during the period of six months, as I have tried to detail to you.

We have another very important feature in the bill, which is called the refunding feature. What do you mean by refunding?

As I said a few moments ago, there was a vast amount of betterments and improvements which were made for the various railroad companies at the demand of the Government itself necessitated by the war period. These betterments and improvements are charged up to the railroad companies. The railroad companies have certain moneys to obtain from the Government on account of the standard return. The railroad companies in turn owe the Government money for these betterments and improvements, and some of the gentlemen on the committee said, "Let there be a casting of the account, a striking of the balance, and if the Government owes more to the railroad companies than the railroad companies in turn owe to the Government, let the balance be struck, and then let the accounting be had in that way." Others, again, took the view that these betterments and improvements were of such great amount that it would be a hardship and almost an impossibility financially for many of these companies to raise the money to pay for these betterments and improvements immediately.

What, then, was the solution of the problem? If gentlemen during the reading of this bill will turn to page 9, section 205, they will find the following:

The indebtedness of any carrier corporation to the United States existing at the termination of Federal control incurred for additions or betterments made during Federal control or for advances made by the United States or incurred to pay off any carrier's indebtedness, and properly chargeable to capital account, shall, at the request of the carrier, be extended for a period of 10 years, or a shorter period, at the carrier's option, with interest at the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal control act.

The original provisions of the bill were that these carriers should pay 6 per cent for this extension of time so to be had, but we found that under the provisions of the Federal control act the President had the right to fix the rate of interest, and that he had fixed the rate of interest in some specific cases at 5 per cent. He has the undoubted right under the authority of law to fix the rate of interest at 4½ or 5½ or 6 per cent or more if he so chooses. Therefore the committee, in its discretion, thought it was no more than fair to say that if the railroad companies owed the Government for these betterments and improvements, and they received this extension of time for a period of 10 years, or a shorter time if they so desired, they should pay the same rate of interest to the Government that the Government paid to them for any amount of money which the Government owed.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. How is that balance secured; and what steps have been taken by the committee to give priority to that balance over existing or subsequent mortgages?

Mr. DEWALT. In short, the provision is this: The Secretary of the Treasury and the Interstate Commerce Commission have the right to examine, first, the stability of the road, and things of that kind, in all their minutiæ, and then to demand securities which are to be approved by him in regard to these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. May I have 10 minutess more?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. I know you will pardon me for asking for additional time, not because I flatter myself that you have any desire to listen to me, but because when one becomes interested in a subject of this kind and attempts, even in the meager way in which I am attempting, to explain some of the provisions of the bill, the time glides by so rapidly that 20 minutes expire even before you have time to take your breath.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania to line 15, page 10, which gives the answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. DEWALT. Yes—

Such indebtedness shall be evidenced, if practicable, by the first-mortgage bonds of the carrier; but if this is impracticable, then in such practicable form as shall be prescribed by the President.

Now, I was about to refer to this question of rates. One of the mooted matters in the committee—and I am not disclosing any committee secrets—was this question of the supervision and regulation of rates. Some of the membership of the committee went so far as to say that the initiation of rates should be lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission. That in itself would have been a complete subversion of all the prescribed forms and rules of rate making that we have established for a great number of years.

The initiation of rates properly, in the judgment of the committee, should be lodged in the companies themselves. And the reason for that is this: That the needs of different transportation lines, be they large or small, be they regional or transcontinental, or be they only short lines, are best known to the management of the companies themselves. Therefore the initiation of the rates should be lodged in the companies. But after the initiation takes place, then the regulation or supervision, either by complaint or by application, should be under the supervision of the body constituted for a great number of years and which has given great satisfaction, to wit, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

But the complaint from a great many people is and has been that the Interstate Commerce Commission, while it has an inflexible rule, as they call it, namely, that all rates shall be just and reasonable and shall not be unjust or discriminatory, nevertheless this same body, according to the allegations of some, has never taken into consideration some of the constituent elements that should go to make up the rates.

In other words, it has been the complaint of men who worked upon railroads that when they go to the superintendent or the management of the railroad company and say that they desire a larger wage, the management in times of peace has said that they would be very glad to do that, but they are bound by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, although it says that it does take into consideration the scale of wages of the employees, nevertheless never has done so, and therefore we can not raise your wages.

Now, be that true or untrue, be it just or unjust, the complaint has been made, and therefore this committee again, in its discretion, perhaps not in its wisdom—because no committee, in my opinion, claims to be all wise, and I know the modesty of the chairman and the modesty as well of the members of the subcommittee—I know they do not claim to be all wise, and we have established in this bill not only the general rule that rates shall be just and reasonable, and they shall not be unjust and discriminatory, but we have said in making up this rule in regard to rates, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration what? Turn to page 65, and you will find the language, as follows:

In reaching its conclusions as to the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice the commission shall take into consideration the interest of the public, the shippers, the reasonable cost of maintenance, and operation (including the wages of labor, depreciation, and taxes), and a fair return upon the value of the property used or held for the service of transportation.

Not all property that is held by the companies, not the rights of way that are not used, not hotels which are built for railroad companies to use for hotel purposes, not for property that is held by railroad companies in perpetuity, perhaps, and never to be used for transportation purposes, but a fair valuation upon the property used in transportation service. That, coupled with the needs of the shipper, the needs of the public, with a fair allowance for wages and taxes and just depreciation, in the judgment of the committee or a majority thereof was the rule by which this rate-making should be fixed. With that I leave the bill with you. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. I will if I have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to ask if there is any legal definition anywhere of what constitutes property used or held for service of transportation?

Mr. DEWALT. I suppose that is a technical term in railroading. The meaning of it was this, as I tried to state: There is a great deal of property held by railroad companies which is not being presently used for transportation purposes; what we mean is engines, cars, roadbed, and so forth, terminals, stations, and things necessary in transportation service.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Of course, in the latter years railroads, under the direction of the State commissions and other regulatory bodies, have made an expenditure of one kind and another. They have built elaborate stations, and approaches to these have been included.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; they naturally go into the transportation service. You can not transport freight and passengers unless you have terminal stations from and to which you carry them.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; and on the other hand a railroad station which costs the carrier $50,000 will bring in as much business as one that costs $500,000.

Mr. DEWALT. That is true. A striking example can be called to your mind. You know that under the land grants given the railroads—20 miles on each side, in order that the railroads might be built—those companies in a large measure yet own a portion of these lands. They are not used for transportation service, and therefore you could not include them in fair valuation.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that these terminal companies are organized with a different class of stockholders entirely?

Mr. DEWALT. Many of them are, but not all of them.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McGLENNON].

Mr. McGLENNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to announce that we have in the gallery to-night a distinguished visitor, Governor-elect Edwards, of New Jersey. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER].

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, after the masterly analysis and explanation of the measure now under consideration, by the distinguished chairman of the committee having it in charge, followed by the other excellent remarks submitted by more experienced Members, it would involve presumption on my part to undertake any general discussion of its provisions. Speaking broadly, I may say that I am in accord with most of the salient provisions of the bill. In voting for the measure in committee, however, it was with a distinct understanding that I might, without exposing myself to any charge or suspicion of impropriety, oppose the provisions of Title III dealing with disputes between carriers and their employees, and offer something in their stead.

In the vast amount of thinking upon the problem of what shall be done with these ever-increasing disputes there seem to have been developed two general lines of thought. One has as its central idea the constitution of certain tribunals fairly, impartially, and honestly made up, to which the parties must go with their differences and to whose arbitrament they must submit. Accompanying this plan is the thought that, having established a fair and impartial tribunal, the right to strike should be denounced as unlawful and that the employees should be subjected to the penalty of a violated law if they see fit thereafter to exercise that claimed privilege. The other general line of thought has as its fundamental principle the establishment of tribunals to which the disputant parties may, if they please, submit their controversies, and whose award may or may not be accepted, as the parties may elect.

I am constrained to believe that in this instance, as in most cases, the truth is to be found in the medium between extremes, and I have endeavored hurriedly to outline the provisions of a substitute, which I propose to offer at the proper time, for Title III of the bill as reported by the committee.

When one comes to discuss the theory involving compulsory arbitration and denying, limiting, or qualifying the right to strike, he is at once confronted with the argument advanced by the brotherhoods and others that such a measure would be violative of the Federal Constitution. They rest this contention primarily upon the provisions of the amendment written into the Constitution of this country as the result of the war of sections, and they assert with great vehemence that it is not within the power of Government to deny to any individual the right "to cease work."

There can be no clear thinking upon this problem, Mr. Chairman, unless you bear in mind the fact that there is a vast distinction between the right to cease one's employment and the right to strike. The right to cease one's employment means just what the words imply—the right to quit work whenever it suits the individual for any reason or for no reason at all; but a strike, Mr. Chairman, is where a body of men engaged in common employment cease work at or about the same time pursuant to a previous agreement expressly or tacitly entered into for the purpose of coercing compliance with their demands, but with the intention all the while of returning to their employment when their object is attained.

No constitution, State or Federal, with which I am familiar either expressly or impliedly guarantees to any man the right to strike. However, we do find in the organic law of the Nation a guaranty of the right to life, liberty, property, reputation, and happiness. Yet we see the Government establishing tribunals limiting those rights, and I ask the question, What halo is there about the head of this claimed right to strike not mentioned in any constitution that removes it from the sphere of governmental regulation? [Applause.] If you or I violate the law of our land, and the penalty for that violation is that we shall forfeit our life, there is a tribunal of government established to which we must go, and we are not permitted to choose any one of its members. They are chosen rather because they have no interest in and no knowledge of the case. You go to that tribunal not voluntarily but by command of the Government. You submit that important right to that tribunal, and you are bound by its decree. If you are engaged in some unlawful enterprise which violates a criminal statute, the punishment for which is confinement in prison, your constitutionally guaranteed freedom is involved, and yet you are compelled to go to organized tribunals of government and have your right to liberty passed upon by your fellows.

If the shelter that protects your wife and offspring is about to be taken from over your head upon some claim or other that your title is defective, do you assert your right of property at the end of a shotgun or by the use of a bludgeon? No; you go to established tribunals of the Government with your case, and you abide by their decisions. If the sanctity of your home is invaded, if your own honor or the honor of a member of your family is called in question, you are compelled to seek relief in a court of justice and be bound by its judgment. If there is one thing that inheres in nature, it is that a man should have the control and direction of his own offspring. Yet the Government, exercising its powers for the protection of the general welfare, sets up a tribunal the power of which may extend to the point of taking from you your only child and putting it in stranger hands, even denying you the right of visitation. Yet when it comes to the right to strike, the exercise of which may involve misery and suffering in every home in this land, we are told by the specious advocates of the doctrine of the right to quit work that the power of Government has ceased; that we are impotent to do anything in the way of limiting this sacred privilege; that we must stand mute and helpless while innocent women and children starve to death on hearths that are cold in order that this hideous monster may have its brutal will!

I say to you, my colleagues, that if you have $10,000 and you are pleased to invest it in a farm, the Government does not undertake to tell you how you shall sow, when you shall reap, what crops you shall cultivate, or what you shall do with your produce. The public interest is sufficiently protected in that case by the intuitive desire of the individual to get the best possible results from his efforts.

But if you take that $10,000 and invest it in railroad securities it immediately becomes impressed with a trust in the public interest. By virtue of that fact the Government lays the hand of the law upon it and undertakes to and, in fact, does regulate it with due regard for the general welfare. You are told what your rights shall be. You are given directions in great particularity of detail, and your property to many intents and purposes is beyond your individual control. I assert that by the same token when men voluntarily seek employment in the interstate transportation of this country they, too, should be impressed with a trust in the public interest, and they should not be permitted to have a strangle hold upon the throat of the American people. [Applause.] Neither does it meet the case to shout involuntary servitude—slavery! Any man engaged in railroad employment may cease his work when he pleases. But if the Government defines the laborer's rights in that employment, and he willingly and of his own accord embarks upon or continues in such service, how can it be said that he is compelled to submit to involuntary servitude? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this Government is not impotent in this situation. The general welfare, the public interests, are paramount, and whenever any class of individuals undertakes to go counter to the public interests or the general welfare that class must be restrained, else you must subscribe to the doctrine that a part is greater than the whole. [Applause.] I am willing to stake what meager reputation I may have as a lawyer upon the proposition that there is not one line, not one suggestion, not one intimation, to be found in the Federal Constitution denying to the Congress the power to regulate or, if it pleases, to deny the right to strike to men engaged in interstate transportation service. Is this the time and the occasion for the exercise of such power? I am firmly convinced, Mr. Chairman, that the great masses of the American people are expecting something of this Congress in this respect.

It is my belief that if we undertake to deal with this question in some milk-and-honey way, we will disappoint these expectations. Yes, more; we will fail in the discharge of our duty and will expose the Congress to the just charge of cowardice.

Let us remember in this great crisis that the paramountcy of public interest, the protection of the rights of the Nation, must be the dominating factor in the solution of this problem. We are told, Mr. Chairman, that if we define a crime arising out of the exercise of this privilege to strike and attach a penalty, it will be impossible to enforce the law. Well, if that be true, the Government of the United States of America is impotent and worse than a failure. If there is anything to prevent the enforcement of such a law, it will be the great number of law violators involved; but out of consideration for the views of some of my colleagues with whom I have discussed this question I have undertaken to eliminate that factor from the amendment which I shall propose. But if it is impracticable to enforce a law making it criminal to strike, surely it is not impracticable to require the members of these organizations who defy the laws of their country, and in so doing violate their contracts of employment, to answer in damages to the party aggrieved for the harm and injury they have wrought. When I come to the consideration of the provision of the committee bill I find myself lost in a labyrinth.

> They wind me in and wind me out
> And leave me wandering round in doubt
> As to whether the snake that made the track
> Was going home or coming back.

The machinery is cumbersome, impracticable, unwieldy, and unduly expensive. But if that were the only criticism I should be pleased to pass it by and say "a matter of detail rests largely in judgment." But the next thing we encounter in this bill is that it overlooks the fundamental principle that the public interest is paramount. In making up the personnel of the board of appeals the representatives of the public are denied the privilege of voting. Such a defect needs no comment. But this is not all. The decision rendered by this tribunal is of no binding force and no means are provided by the act to carry the judgment into execution and make it effective. The chairman in discussing this aspect of the measure said that, of course, a member of organized labor or other employee should be held to the observance of his contractual obligations, but to announce that principle and stop there is merely to announce a self-evident truth. If he should be held answerable for the violation of his contract, why not take the logical next step and devise some effective means whereby he may be made answerable? Surely it is not impracticable after strikes are over and ended, when you have time without limit to adjust your differences, to bring men to account in the civil courts for a violation of a contract.

Not only is that true, Mr. Chairman, but I predict that the machinery set up by the committee will fail to satisfy the laborers themselves. As generous to their interests as I believe it to be, as unmindful of the public interests as I know it to be, it will fail to satisfy labor. Any attempt on the part of the Government to say to these men, "You shall have some regard for the public welfare, you shall not go counter to the interest of the masses," will be resented as an invasion of their right to strike. The question therefore for this Congress to answer is, Will we meet this situation like red-blooded Americans and write a statute in the book that will have some teeth in it; that will protect human life; that will prevent misery and suffering; that will make property secure; that will violate the rights of no man and cause no inconvenience to any law-respecting citizen, and that will guarantee the peace, quiet, and tranquillity of the Nation?

You suggest, How may this be done? But before going to that there is one further observation I wish to make. Bear in mind that the effect of the decision reached by this unwieldy, cumbersome machinery is to define a term which is to be included in the contracts between the employer and the employee, or which is to be construed as a term in the contract. It is elementary law that courts of equity will not grant specific performance of contracts for personal services. A man has the power, as distinguished from the right, to violate his contractual obligations and be held answerable for the damages that ensue. A strike detrimental to the public interest or which prevents the movement of interstate commerce is not denounced as unlawful, and no provision in the committee bill would be the basis for injunctive relief in a court of equity.

What, Mr. Chairman, has vitalized the proceedings instituted and maintained by the Federal Government in its effort to deal with the unthinkable coal strike? What element vitalizes those proceedings, I ask? Is it not the element of illegality arising out of a violation of the provisions of the Lever Act, which characterizes the act in which these men are engaged as unlawful? And I feel that I would fail in my Americanism if I did not take advantage of this opportunity to say that my unbounded admiration and respect goes out to the present administration for the courageous American stand it has taken in this important crisis. [Applause.]

In dealing with problems of this sort we should be above politics. When an assault is made upon the Government we should be Americans first and Democrats and Republicans afterwards. It has been stated that Mr. Lewis, the leader of the striking coal miners, sent a very beautiful message to the Department of Justice; but what was that message?

We are Americans. We can not fight our Government.

Had it not been for the provisions of the Lever Act they would not have been fighting their Government. Let us not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the Lever Act is a war measure and will terminate when peace is concluded. Shall we leave the American people helpless in time of peace? Shall we sit here and have the executives of the railroad brotherhoods tell us, "Unless you grant our demands we will tie up the railroads of this country so tight they will never run again?" yet take no action providing against such a calamity? Remember, my colleagues, the responsibility for such a situation will rest upon your shoulders and mine if we fail our country in this important hour. We must enact some law which will enable the Government to protect the people in the event a nation-wide railroad strike should be called, or the public will hold us accountable for our delinquency. In addition to that, when an act is characterized as a crime or is branded as unlawful, any man or any set of men committing that act immediately will encounter a hostile public opinion, the force of which will be almost irresistible.

The provisions of the committee bill are not sufficiently far-reaching to lay a predicate for relief in a court of equity, and they wholly overlook the element of public opinion.

Finally, the judgment contemplated by the bill can be satisfied only out of the common property of the union. The common property of the union? What union would be so simple as to provide a fund out of which you might compel them to answer for their strikes? There will be no common fund. There will be nothing out of which to secure satisfaction of the judgment. Like the historic apple, "There won't be no core."

The provisions of the bill, in my judgment, and I say it with no purpose of offending, do not meet the situation in any important particular.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is in the interest of orderly government—I believe it is in the interest of the general welfare—that all human controversies should be subjected to the arbitrament of duly constituted tribunals.

Of course, no law dealing with this subject would have any claim upon the masses of the people which did not at the time it denounced the strike as unlawful substitute some procedure whereby disputes between employer and employee might be adjusted. There must be established some board, some commission, some institution, to which these men may go, have that institution fairly, justly, and honestly constituted, and compel them to submit their controversies to it. If human beings are to be trusted in dealing with your life and mine, with your happiness and mine, with your property and mine, I say to you that there is no reason why we should recognize the rights of a class of individuals as being too sacred to be trusted to human tribunals. I have endeavored in a very short time and under adverse conditions to outline the measure which I shall offer; and, in order that the Members may have it before them for consideration, I shall read it at this time. I know that my amendment has one advantage over the committee bill, whatever defects it may have in other respects. It will not keep you up until the wee small hours to read it. It is brief. I will read:

TITLE III.—DISPUTES BETWEEN CARRIERS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES.

SEC. 300. There is hereby created a board composed of nine members, to be known as the Board of Railroad Wages and Working Conditions, hereinafter referred to as the board. The members of the board shall be appointed by the President in the following manner: Four members shall be selected from a list of nine names submitted to the President by the executives of the railroad labor organizations; four members shall be selected from a list of nine names submitted by the executives of railroad companies. The eight members thus named shall meet within 10 days from the date of their appointment and shall at once proceed to elect a chairman who shall constitute the ninth member of the board. If within 10 days from such meeting the members fail to elect a chairman as aforesaid, the President shall appoint a chairman, who shall serve for seven years, and who shall hold office until his successor be named and qualified in the same manner as heretofore provided. Two other members shall be appointed for a term of seven years each; the other members shall be appointed for terms of six, five, four, three, two, and one years as the President may designate, and all appointments or reappointments thereafter shall be for seven years, and each member shall hold his office until his successor be named and qualified. All vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments. Not more than five members of the board shall be members of the same political party. The chairman shall receive a salary of $12,000 and each member shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, together with the necessary traveling expenses while on the discharge of official duties, to date from his taking the oath of office.

SEC. 301. The board is hereby authorized and empowered, in all cases of disputes between any common carrier by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, subject to the act to regulate commerce, and its employees as to wages, terms, and conditions of employment, hours of service, or working conditions, after full hearing to prescribe what is, or may be for the future, the just and reasonable wages, terms, and conditions of employment, hours of service, or working conditions, and to issue an order to such carrier to comply with such decision of the board; and such carrier shall conform to such order or requirement and shall not depart from the conditions so prescribed; such order to remain in effect until further order of the board. The board may, upon complaint of any interested party or upon its own motion, suspend or modify its findings and order after giving notice thereof to the interested parties in person, if practicable, otherwise by publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, may I have a brief extension so that I may finish the reading?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBSTER. It provides further:

SEC. 302. The board shall have power to make its own rules of procedure, summon witnesses, administer oaths, order the production of documents deemed necessary by it in any dispute, and employ a secretary, attorneys, and other persons necessary to the execution of its power; and the board is authorized to use and continue the services and authority of the boards heretofore organized by the Director General of Railroads, known as Railway Adjustment Boards, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and the Board of Railway Wages and Working Conditions. The records, rules, and regulations made and promulgated by the said boards and their services may be utilized, and their rules, regulations, and duties may be altered, changed, or modified by the board created by this act, and until so altered, changed, or modified, and, in so far as they may be deemed applicable, the rules and regulations promulgated by said boards, heretofore approved by the Director General of Railroads, may be continued in full force and effect.

SEC. 303. When a wage or labor dispute is brought before the board hearing shall be held at the time, place, and manner to be determined by the board. The board shall speedily and without delay make its findings in writing and shall serve them on the parties in interest. The findings of the board shall be final and the parties thereto shall be bound thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. WEBSTER. I can finish in five minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WEBSTER. It says further:

SEC. 304. It shall be unlawful for any group of employees to enter upon a strike before its controversy with the employer common carrier or carriers has been submitted to the board and until the board has made a finding thereon. If the employer common carrier or carriers conform to the findings of the board, the right of such group or groups thereafter to strike in order to obtain their demands in issue in the controversy thus decided by the board is hereby prohibited and such act shall be unlawful.

SEC. 305. If after such hearing and finding of the board an employer common carrier or carriers shall fail or refuse to abide by such findings, such carrier or carriers shall be liable for the full damages to any employee, or group of employees, whether members of any labor union or organization or not, arising from such breach. Any labor union, or any employee, or group of employees, may commence and prosecute an action for the recovery of the amount due, and in such case the court shall include in any judgment rendered in favor of any employee, union, organization, or group of employees the costs of the action, including a reasonable attorney's fee, which, when recovered, shall be paid to the employee, group of employees, union, or organization as the case may be.

SEC. 306. Any employee, group of employees, labor union, or organization which authorizes any member to strike or break any contract of hire fixed or approved by the board, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, procures, or consents to, or in any manner conspires to effect any breach of findings and conclusions of the board, shall be liable for the full damages to the railroad company or companies, arising from such breach. For the purpose of enforcing such liability (1) service of process or notice may be made upon any employee, employees, chief executive officer, or other official of any labor union or organization; (2) no action for such damages shall abate by reason of death, resignation, removal, or legal incapacity of any official or member of a labor union or organization, or of any change in the membership thereof; (3) such action if brought against any labor union or organization may be prosecuted in its recognized group name; (4) the action, however, shall run against the union or organization jointly and severally against it and the members thereof, or against the employees individually as the carrier or carriers may elect—

There will be something out of which to satisfy the judgment under my law. There will be nothing under the law which I oppose.

Further—

(5) satisfaction of any judgment rendered shall be made from the property of the union or organization or any member or members of the offending union, or from the property of any offending employee or group of employees sued by name: Provided, That no insurance, pension, or sick benefit fund shall be subject to the satisfaction of any such judgment.

SEC. 307. Wherever the word "group" is used herein it shall be held to mean two or more employees, and where the word "strike" is used it shall be held to mean the abandonment of employment by such group pursuant to an agreement, an understanding, or by concert of action: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

SEC. 308. There is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended by the board of railroad wages and working conditions for defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of such board, including the payment of salaries as provided in this title.

You have laid here, Mr. Chairman, a predicate for injunctive relief. These men will confront the same situation that confronted the coal miners and will submit to their Government.

Mr. BEE. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. WEBSTER. In just a minute. I have so little time.

It also provides an efficient means of civilly penalizing men who insist upon asserting the right of being superior to their Government. It protects them by a tribunal that is fair and impartial. Is not the President of the United States capable of appointing a commission that will meet all of the requirements of justice and fair play? It will stabilize industrial conditions. It will guarantee an uninterrupted transportation service. It will bring peace. It will prevent great economic waste. It will establish, as it should be established, that the law is supreme and that no class shall be superior to the law. And unless I mistake the temper of the American people, nevermore will they consent to play the inconspicuous rôle of doormat for the shuffling feet of capital and labor as they struggle for individual gain at the expense of the general welfare. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak until the morning, but learning that this was the only opportunity, I gladly avail myself of it. At this hour I shall only detain the committee to present one phase of transportation.

This bill affords an opportunity to Congress to enlarge the instrumentalities of transportation for the country. We have had many striking lessons during these past few years of the necessity of increasing transportation facilities. Not only do we realize the need of enlarged railroad facilities, but there is to-day a Nation-wide movement for the construction of better highways, and the prophecy is freely made that the introduction of the motor truck upon hard-surfaced roads will, in large degree, increase the facilities of transport over the highways. But there is a natural highway which is, as yet, largely untouched—the waterways of the country. [Applause.]

It is the duty of Congress by legislation to correct any evils which may exist, and to provide remedies by law for increasing water transportation. The opportunity, as I said in the beginning, was afforded in this bill. Has it been availed of by the committee in its report to the House? I do not in the slightest degree disparage the work of the committee. They have indeed had a difficult undertaking. They have given it conscientious thought and labor, and they have brought in a bill in many respects admirable; and never was a bill more clearly analyzed and presented than was this one by the distinguished chairman [Mr. ESCH] in the magnificent introductory address which he made this morning.

And yet in so far as it affects water transportation, it is subject to some criticism. When we have had river and harbor bills before the House in the past, the critics have complained because here and there upon rivers and canals it was said there was no commerce. That is true upon some rivers, and it will be true so long as present conditions continue.

What are some of the existing evils which brought about this situation? First are the ruinous competitive rail rates with water lines. Beginning many years ago, when there were no restraining influences, railroad managers reduced those rates competitive with water, and with few exceptions they yet remain and accomplish the purposes for which they were originally intended.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that the committee has gone a long way in preventing that ruinous competition by giving the commission the power to establish a minimum rate on the railroad?

Mr. SMALL. I will come to that in a moment. I think there are features in the bill which are corrective, and the point which I shall endeavor to make is that they do not go far enough.

Let us take this subject of competitive rail rates made by railroads competitive with water. There is not a line in the bill which attempts in direct and positive terms to correct that evil. Why, pray, should a railroad competitive with a canal or waterway maintain ruinously low competitive rates and 50 or 100 miles in the interior maintain rates very considerably higher? There is no economic justification for any such condition; and wherever it exists, and wherever legislation will remedy it, it ought to be remedied. We thought, in the Panama Canal act of 1912, where railroads were prohibited from increasing low rates competitive with water except by the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that some remedy had been afforded, but in not a single instance has any railroad applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a readjustment or an increase of those rates.

I believe there should be a provision in this bill directing in mandatory terms the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and readjust all rail rates competitive with water, and for several reasons. First, that it is unjust to a natural highway, that ought to be used in the interest of the public; and, second, because of the injustice it works to interior points. I have never found fault with the criticisms of gentlemen who objected to appropriations for rivers the improvement of which was simply intended to secure lower competitive rail rates, and particularly when such lower competitive rail rates worked an injustice to interior sections, because they were compelled to pay the normal or the higher rates; and not until this injustice is corrected and waterways are left to work out their own salvation, and railways shall be compelled to establish and maintain rates which shall be normal and equal throughout the country, will we have a just application of rail rates and will an act of simple justice be done to the waterways of the country.

A committee consisting of some Members of the House and Senators and a number of other gentlemen throughout the country met recently here in Washington for the purpose of drafting some amendments to be submitted to this bill. We did draft several amendments, and one of them sought in a mild way to correct this evil which I have endeavored to describe. Within the limited time at my command I shall not undertake to read the amendment now, but I shall insert it as a part of my remarks, for the information of the House. I ask gentlemen of the committee, when we come to the consideration of this bill for amendment, to give heed to any amendment which may seem to be wise and effective which will cure this old-time evil.

There is another evil which this bill ought to correct. We can never have a healthy condition of water transportation until there are complete facilities for the interchange of traffic between the water lines and the rail lines, such as exist to-day between the different rail lines throughout the country.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does this bill undertake to deal with water transportation and its control at all?

Mr. SMALL. Only in so far as it is associated in one way or another with railroads. For instance, the bill gives the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction of transportation partly by rail and partly by water, and it also attempts to give the commission jurisdiction to establish interchange of traffic between rail lines and water lines.

Mr. BEE. Knowing the gentleman's wide experience in that matter I ask him, what is to-day the regulation or the law with reference to the control of waterways similar to that which the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises over railroads?

Mr. SMALL. The only jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over water transportation is in regard to the interchange of traffic with the railroads.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the most important thing to-day to promote river navigation is the proper provision for terminals and for joint traffic arrangements with the railroads?

Mr. SMALL. I think the gentleman has well stated the proposition.

Mr. DENISON. And this bill provides that?

Mr. SMALL. Let us see. In the Panama Canal act of 1912, which is brought forward as section 6 of the interstate-commerce act, the Interstate Commerce Commission are given jurisdiction to effect the interchange of traffic between rail lines and water lines. I will not take the trouble to read it. Gentlemen are familiar with that provision. Under that jurisdiction the Interstate Commerce Commission have not been active. Upon the contrary, they have been either purposely or inadvertently inactive, and although many applications have been made for a regulation providing joint and proportional rates between rail lines and water lines, very few of those applications have had consideration and action by the commission.

The committee in this bill amend section 6 of the interstate-commerce act, and they improve it; but they still leave it optional with the Interstate Commerce Commission to effect this interchange of traffic when application shall be made to them. One of the amendments which I submitted to the committee for their consideration, and which I submit should be incorporated in the bill, is to make that provision mandatory upon the commission, so that upon proper conditions—that is to say, where a water line is reputable and responsible—they shall be compelled to establish interchange of traffic and joint and proportional rates between it and the connecting railroads. The pending bill also goes too far in conferring jurisdiction over docks and water terminals upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] well said, interchange of traffic between the railroads and water lines upon fair terms is one of the essentials for the building up of water transportation. Everyone knows that this magnificent railway system which we have in the United States is predicated largely upon the system of prorating or interchange of traffic between the different lines, so that a shipper at any one railroad point can obtain a through bill of lading and a through rate to any other point in the United States situated upon a line of railroad, no matter how many different lines of road are traversed between the point of origin and the point of destination. And the Interstate Commerce Commission should be required to institute and establish and maintain the same kind of prorating and interchange of traffic between water lines and railroads as are now required and maintained between different lines of railroad themselves. And the defect in the bill which the committee have presented is in not having amended the paragraph preceding (a), (b), and (c) in section 6 of the interstate-commerce act by making it mandatory upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. At the proper time during the consideration of the bill I hope to offer an amendment to that effect.

Another essential for water transportation is the establishment of some Federal agency having jurisdiction to investigate problems of water transportation, collect data, and make recommendations for the promotion of water transportation. Water lines at present have no friend at court. There is no agency of the Federal Government to whom they can go for advice, for information, and for assistance as intermediaries between them and the Interstate Commerce Commission or other administrative departments of the Government in order to obtain what they may conceive to be their rights under the law. The voluntary committee of which I had the honor to be a member drafted and submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a provision empowering the Bureau of Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the Department of Commerce to do these things. The committee have substantially adopted the language which we presented to them, but they have imposed that duty upon the Secretary of War through the Chief of Engineers. I fear the committee have make a mistake. No one entertains a higher opinion of the engineering skill, the integrity, and the capacity of the Corps of Engineers than I do.

As a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for years I have come in close contact with them. I admire them, and within the scope of their training and experience they are unexcelled. But they are not by training or experience familiar with commerce, nor in the discharge of their public duties have they had occasion to become skilled in transportation problems. I believe that this section on page 21 of the bill which imposes that duty on the Secretary of War, through the Chief of Engineers, is an error, and that it ought to be in the Department of Commerce. I have before me the act creating the Department of Commerce, which in plain and explicit terms confers on that department jurisdiction of transportation and the features of it which are concerned in industry and commerce. This investigating bureau would be more appropriate, in my opinion, in the Department of Commerce.

In the provision for Government-owned boats which are now under the jurisdiction of the United States Railroad Administration, there was submitted to the committee an amendment which sought to transfer those boats to the Shipping Board. In our opinion the transfer should be either to the Shipping Board or to some bureau in the Department of Commerce. The bill which the committee has presented transfers them to the Secretary of War, to be operated through the Chief of Engineers. With the greatest deference to the skill and ability of these officers, I submit that nothing in their training or experience fits them in any peculiar way for the operation of water lines as a part of the transportation system of the country.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask if it was the gentleman's thought that the Government was going to continue to operate the boats as a permanent policy?

Mr. SMALL. No.

Mr. DENISON. It is only a temporary policy?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that this provision meets the demand of the situation in turning these boats over to the War Department and the Chief of Engineers until they can finally be disposed of? The Government does not intend to remain in the boat transportation business.

Mr. SMALL. I do not understand that it was in the thought of the committee or the thought of Congress that they should be operated indefinitely, but they ought to be operated for a term of years in order to demonstrate by actual experience their efficiency and capacity to carry commerce for the benefit of the public and with profit to themselves.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. I might say that the experience of the people up through New York, where the Government has undertaken to manage canal boats and such things, has resulted in failure, and the only proper thing to do with these boats is to do just what you agreed to do with the ships, sell them for the best obtainable prices to men who know all about them and who have learned the business.

Mr. SMALL. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that different conditions prevail on the Mississippi River and on the Warrior system than prevails on the waterways of New York.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. In the bill under consideration there is no provision for the sale or purchase of new boats if the old ones are worn out. There is no adequate provision for the operation even for a temporary period of time. Is that true?

Mr. SMALL. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Inasmuch as we are not compelled to adjourn at any stated time, will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, while I live on the Atlantic seaboard, I conceive it my duty, as it is the duty of every other Member, to consider these questions from a national viewpoint. There is no more pressing problem before the country than the establishment of commerce on the rivers of the Mississippi Valley between St. Paul and New Orleans. [Applause.]

It is the duty of the Government to make whatever expenditures for experiments that may be necessary in order to rehabilitate and reestablish that commerce, not alone for the benefit of the great Mississippi Valley, but for the welfare of the country. In the operation of these boats for four or five or more years, in order to demonstrate their practicability and profit of operation as well as public benefit, they should be operated by men who are familiar with that class of work, who are skilled in it by training and experience.

Mr. Chairman, I can not proceed at any length along these lines, but when we come to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, I hope that the membership of the House will not lose this opportunity to afford some remedy for these two evils connected with water transportation. One is to stop the cutthroat competition, not only in justice to the waterways but in justice to the interior section, and the other is to provide by directing the Interstate Commerce Commission for the establishment and maintenance of interchange of traffic between the water lines and the railroads to just as full an extent as now exists between the different lines of railroads.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that the provisions of this bill which authorize the fixing or establishment of the maximum and minimum rates in competing water and rail points is an improvement of the conditions we have now?

Mr. SMALL. A very great improvement.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that that will encourage river traffic?

Mr. SMALL. It will, but if you have an inactive Interstate Commerce Commission who conceive that their chief purpose is to administer the railroads without regard to the rehabilitation of the water lines, any provision of law which you make will be nugatory.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This places the matter entirely under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMALL. As to interchange of traffic, yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. And the fixing and adjusting of these rates?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that that is not the proper body that should be charged with it?

Mr. SMALL. I think it is the proper body. The point I make is that the law should be directory and not simply give them jurisdiction or place it within their discretion. This is the point I am trying to emphasize, that we have had since 1912 a provision in the law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction to establish interchange of traffic between water lines and rail lines, and I ask the gentleman if he knows of an instance where they have established it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; the complaint has been always that the Interstate Commerce Commission took no interest in traffic on the waterways.

Mr. SMALL. Is it not time we compelled them to do so, or get some agency of Government that will do it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I agree with the gentleman, if there is any practical way of doing it.

Mr. SMALL. I think we can propose an amendment in such terms as will make it mandatory.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know of any specific instances where they have refused to do so on application?

Mr. SMALL. I can not recall where they have directly refused, but in a number of instances they have taken no action whatever in response to applications.

When the pending bill is under consideration for amendment I shall offer the following amendments:

On page 46, after line 7, insert the following as subsection (8):

Where there is an existing line of water transportation, or one is proposed to be immediately established, it shall be unlawful for any railroad which operates between points competitive to said water line to reduce its existing rates with a view to meeting the difference between water rates and the rail rates, unless after full hearing the commission shall find that such reduction of rail rates is justified in the public interest. In determining the question of public interest the commission shall consider the rates charged by the water line as presumptively reasonable and shall also consider the advisability or necessity of maintaining increased facilities of transportation: And provided further, That the commission shall not permit any railroad to reduce its existing rates as between points competitive with the water line or lines unless such railroad maintain such reduced rates as the maximum at all intermediate points on all lines between the points of origin and destination.

On page 60, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "irrespective of the ownership of the dock."

One page 60, line 7, strike out the words "construct a suitable dock and."

On page 60, lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, strike out the words "such dock shall be considered," etc., and ending with the words, in line 12, "in other sections."

On page 60, line 14, strike out the words "docks and."

On page 60, line 16, strike out the words "docks and."

On page 61, strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive.

On page 64, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "or the maximum or minimum, or maximum and minimum" and insert in line 22, after the word "case," the words "as the maximum."

On page 65, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "or less than the minimum."

On page 67, line 3, strike out the words "or the maxima or minima, or maxima and minima" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as the maximum."

On page 58, strike out the words from lines 7 to 25, inclusive, and, page 59, strike out the words in lines 1 to 3, inclusive.

On page 59, line 25, strike out the words "to establish" and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "they shall establish."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE RACE PROBLEM.

Mr. SPENCER. If there is no objection, I ask to have printed in the RECORD certain recommendations of the Southern Sociological Congress with regard to the race question. The question is one of such exceeding importance that I am sure these suggestions and recommendations will prove of great value.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Editorial in the Outlook of Sept. 10, 1919.]

THE RACE PROBLEM.

"The race problem is national in scope, but its final solution must be locally determined. It is a problem of human relationship, and this human relationship is reducible in the final analysis to the one white man, face to face with one negro. The national race problem is really only a multiplication of the problem of this individual relationship.

"This is why the Outlook has always insisted that the negro problem of the South could be solved only by the South. The North can advise and aid, and that is all. Now that the North is becoming acutely aware of the fact that it possesses a race problem of its own, while the situation is reversed, the principle still remains the same. East St. Louis—an Illinois, not a Missouri, city, we ask our readers to observe—and Chicago, Washington, Knoxville, and Atlanta, to each its peculiar problem, to each its own solution. But the intensely local character of the race problem should not prevent the broadest national consideration of its causes and effects. The North can learn from the South and the South from the North. But upon each section and locality must rest the responsibility for putting into effect the conclusions reached in general discussion and study.

"It is this dual character of the problem in its local and national aspects which lends peculiar interest to the proposal recently put forward by the Southern Sociological Congress, of which Bishop Theodore D. Bratton is president.

"This proposal, at the suggestion of President Wilson, was laid before the conference of the governors of the several States recently in session at Salt Lake City, Utah. The governors' conference broke all precedents in permitting Bishop Bratton to speak at one of its sessions. The resolution which Bishop Bratton proposed was made a part of the official records of the conference, and received high praise from many of the governors present.

"The resolution laid before the governors' conference and the program called for therein are of such merit and importance that we republish them here in full. The resolution reads:

"'Recognizing that the negro is a permanent and increasingly important factor in the development of our national life, the Southern Sociological Congress considers the solution of the problem of race relations as the most delicate and difficult single task for American democracy. We believe that no enduring basis of good will between the white and colored peoples in this country can be developed except on the fundamental principles of justice, cooperation, and race integrity. The obligations of this generation to posterity demand that we exert our utmost endeavor to preserve the purity of our democratic ideals expressed in the American Constitution, as well as the purity of the blood of both races. With this belief the Southern Sociological Congress has worked out a program for the improvement of race relations which we respectfully submit to the conference of governors in the earnest hope that this body of distinguished leaders may lend its beautiful influence toward making this program effective throughout the Union.

"'The program is—

"'First, that the negro should be liberated from the blighting fear of injustice and mob violence. To this end it is imperatively urgent that lynching be prevented—

"'1. By the enlistment of negroes themselves in preventing crimes that provoke mob violence.

"'2. By prompt trial and speedy execution of persons guilty of heinous crimes.

"'3. By legislation that will make it unnecessary for a woman who has been assaulted to appear in court to testify publicly.

"'4. By legislation that will give the governor authority to dismiss a sheriff for failure to protect a prisoner in his charge.

"'Second, that the citizenship rights of the Negro should be safeguarded, particularly—

"'1. By securing proper traveling accommodations.

"'2. By providing better housing conditions and preventing extortionate rents.

"'3. By providing adequate educational and recreational facilities.

"'Third, that closer cooperation between white and colored citizens should be promoted (without encouraging any violation of race integrity)—

"'1. By organizing local committees, both white and colored, in as many communities as possible for the consideration of interracial problems.

"'2. By the employment of negro physicians, nurses, and policemen as far as practicable in work for sanitation, public health, and law enforcement among their own people.

"'3. By enlisting all agencies possible in fostering justice, good will, and kindliness in all individual dealings of the members of one race with members of the other.

"'4. By the appointment of a standing committee by the governor of each State for the purpose of making a careful study of the causes underlying race friction with the view of recommending proper means for their removal.'

Resolution on lynching adopted by the Southern Sociological Congress in annual session at Knoxville, Tenn., May 12, 1919.

"The Southern Sociological Congress strongly condemns lynching and mob rule, which are un-American and subversive of law and order. We pledge ourselves to do everything possible to prevent lynching, and we call upon the editors of the public press, the ministers, the teachers, and other leaders responsible for creating public sentiment to proclaim against this practice, which constitutes both a disgrace and menace in our own land and also discredits American democracy abroad, and we urge the immediate exercise of all possible State and Federal power to put a speedy end to these outrages throughout the country."

RAILROAD STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission acknowledging the receipt of Senate resolution 222, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and report to the Senate the facts in connection with the present or prospective ownership or control by the Government of the Dominion of Canada of any line or lines of railway, or part thereof, situate within the territory of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Shipping Board, acknowledging receipt of Senate resolution 226 requesting certain information with respect to the requisitioning of ships under construction in American shipyards for Norwegian citizens and the amount of claims accruing out of such requisitioning, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, relative to the so-called Sterling bill establishing a department of education.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Harrisburg, Pa., November 10, 1919.

Hon. Senator GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By order of a special convention of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, held in Pittsburgh recently, I forward to you a copy of a resolution there adopted:

Resolution 8, introduced by resolutions committee.

"Resolved, That the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, protests most emphatically against United States Senate bill No. 3317, introduced by Senator STERLING, which, ostensibly, aims to punish with heavy penalties any advocacy of a change of government by violence or violent resistance to Government authority, but which may readily be construed, as was the espionage act, to apply to any vehement protest against existing conditions.

"The orderly forces of Pennsylvania labor realize the sinister menace of this bill to the American liberties of the working people; therefore be it further

"Resolved, That we call upon the Congress of the United States to defeat this bill; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to Senators PENROSE, KNOX, FRANCE, MCCORMICK, CAPPER, LA FOLLETTE, GRONNA, and NORRIS."

Thanking you for giving it your fullest consideration, I am,

Very truly, yours,

C. F. QUINN, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I also present resolutions adopted at the national convention of the American War Mothers, assembled in Washington, D. C., September 29 to October 2, 1919. These resolutions have been sent to me by Mrs. Siver Serumgard, of Devils Lake, N. Dak., and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The American War Mothers in national convention assembled in Washington, D. C., from September 29 to October 2, 1919, adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That we ask Congress to select the most remunerative of the many soldiers' bonus bills now before them and adopt it quickly."

The officers of the American War Mothers met with the Gold Star Mothers during the national convention in Washington and adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That a request be sent to our Congressmen to grant the wishes of the parents in regard to the burial of the bodies of our sons and daughters who died in the cause and return to them the bodies of their dead if they so desire; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress be requested to cause the return to this country of all the American dead, to be buried together in one cemetery near the center of the United States, except in individual cases where parents wish the body to remain on foreign soil or be buried in private plats; and be it further

"Resolved, That a suitable monument in such a cemetery be erected to our beloved dead, to be paid for by voluntary subscriptions, Congress to appoint a commission of five, two War Mothers and three war fathers, representing the North, South, East, and West, and center of the United States, to receive donations, this fund to be known as the memorial monument fund; and be it further

"Resolved, That the State which shall be selected to have the honor of being the last resting place of our dead heroes should donate the space."

Mrs. ALICE M. FRENCH,
National War Mother.
Mrs. RICHARD M. COLEMAN,
Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I present resolutions adopted by the National Federation of Construction Industries in relation to the needs of the construction industry, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRIES,
Philadelphia, Pa., November 3, 1919.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to call your attention to the attached memorial of the National Federation of Construction Industries in relation to the needs of the construction industry, to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and to the attached resolution of the National Federation of Construction Industries relative to bill S. 2094, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.

Copies of this memorial and resolution have been sent to the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the members of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Respectfully,

JOHN C. FRAZEE,
Executive Secretary.

Memorial of the National Federation of Construction Industries in relation to the needs of the construction industry.

To the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they are an association of persons and national and local organizations concerned as manufacturers or contractors or otherwise in the building or construction industry of the United States.

That the present condition of shortage in building and structures has been largely brought about through the curtailment of the construction industry by the Government during the war.

That the tendency of the Federal Reserve System, admirable in its general effect upon the business of the country, has been to promote the use of capital upon short-term loans, made through national and other banks.

That the attraction of capital to such loans has drawn capital away from long-term loans based upon mortgages on real estate.

That the erection of the required dwellings and manufacturing buildings, by increasing the plant facilities of the United States, will tend to increase production and decrease prices.

That there is a need at the present time in the United States for from 600,000 to 1,000,000 new dwellings as homes for workmen and others, and of many other buildings for business and other purposes, which constitute cumulated requirements caused by the nearly complete cessation during the war of building for other than war purposes.

That the preference created by the Federal reserve law for the investment of capital in commercial discounts and other like forms of investment has resulted in withdrawing large sums of money from availability for loans on building and real estate, and has thus greatly hindered the construction industry and increased the difficulty attendant upon the restoration of normal conditions in the construction industry.

After careful consideration of the situation, as above outlined, the National Federation of Construction Industries is convinced that a comprehensive study should be made of the sources of capital available for home and other building purposes, the recent withdrawal of capital from long-term mortgages on real estate, the causes of such action, the unfortunate results to the construction industry and to those who desire to own and occupy buildings for production or for dwelling purposes, and the possibility of legislative correction of the evils unintentionally created by otherwise beneficial legislative action.

The National Federation of Construction Industries therefore respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States that a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate and Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, or a joint committee of both Houses of Congress, be appointed to make an investigation of the matters above outlined, to the end that there may be developed a modern system of long-term banking, complementing but not conflicting with the Federal Reserve System, so that the Nation's wealth may be more completely mobilized both for times of peace and for times of emergency, and so that national development may be promoted during the period of reconstruction.

ERNEST T. TRIGG, President.

Attest 31st October, 1919:

JOHN C. FRAZEE,
Executive Secretary.

Resolution of the National Federation of Construction Industries relative to bill S. 2094.

Whereas the operation of the revenue and banking laws of the United States has caused a steady withdrawal of capital available for loans upon real estate and has thus seriously interfered with the progress of building construction and national development; and

Whereas it is highly important not only to the construction industry but to the welfare of the Nation at large that the erection of homes and other needed buildings shall be speedily resumed; and

Whereas loans upon real estate should be at least as attractive as other forms of investment if the erection of homes and other needed buildings is to continue: It is therefore

Resolved, By the directors of the National Federation of Construction Industries that they heartily indorse the purpose of and earnestly recommend the passage of S. 2094, introduced by Senator WILLIAM M. CALDER, of New York, entitled "A bill to encourage the building of homes by providing for exemption from taxation of the income from mortgages on real estate," modified as Congress in its wisdom may deem necessary, because the passage of this bill will tend to restore the balance in attractiveness to investors between loans upon real estate and other forms of investment, which balance has been destroyed through the operation of the existing laws, and because such restoration will encourage the construction of homes and other buildings now requisite to the happiness and prosperity of the people of the United States.

Resolved further, That the executive secretary be requested to communicate to Senator CALDER, Representative NOLAN, and Representative MCLAUGHLIN the appreciation of the directors of their interest in this important matter, and that a copy of these resolutions be laid before them.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate and to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House.

ERNEST T. TRIGG, President.

Attest 31st October, 1919:

JOHN C. FRAZEE,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I have received resolutions adopted by the Friends of Irish Freedom at a mass meeting of over 10,000 citizens and voters of Detroit, Mich., relative to the independence of Ireland, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., November 6, 1919.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed you will find a copy of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of over 10,000 citizens and voters of the city of Detroit.

Will you be good enough to acknowledge receipt of these resolutions, and advise what disposition has been made of them?

Respectfully, yours,

FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM,
JAMES F. MURPHY, Secretary.

Resolutions adopted by the Friends of Irish Freedom at Detroit meeting, October 16, 1919.

Whereas we hold, with the signers of our own Declaration of Independence, that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, a principle reiterated by the United States on our entering the World War, and later confirmed by President Wilson, when he said:

"No peace can last or ought to last which does not recognize and accept the principle that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

And

Whereas Ireland, by a vast majority of its people, has determined itself as an independent Republic, by ballot in orderly election: Be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of Detroit, Mich., in mass meeting assembled, request our Government to act in accordance with America's declared principles and officially recognize that Republic of Ireland and its duly elected Government; and

Whereas the ratifying of the proposed covenant of the league of nations in its present form, without the previous recognition of Ireland's independence, would be, in effect, to disregard Ireland's rights, to admit Britain's claim to rule Ireland as a part of her legitimate possessions, and to commit the United States to the maintenance of Britain's rule in Ireland by pledging our strength as a Nation to Britain against any nation which might seek to assist Ireland to regain her liberty; Be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our Senate, in particular upon Michigan's Representatives, Senators TOWNSEND and NEWBERRY, to oppose and vote against the said covenant; and

Whereas England is expending, approximately, at the rate of $60,000,000 per year on her army of occupation in Ireland alone, not to mention the still larger sums spent in maintaining armies of occupation amongst other subject peoples: Be it further

Resolved, That we call upon Congress to withhold further loans or financial accommodations to Great Britain until she withdraws her army of occupation from Ireland.

Copies of these resolutions to be sent to the President of the United States, to Senators TOWNSEND and NEWBERRY, all other Members of the Senate, and all Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Edge bill, providing for an international banking exchange, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the establishment of a Federal home-loan board, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a memorial of the Robert Emmet Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Houtzdale, Pa., remonstrating against the deportation of certain Hindus, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange No. 1733, Patrons of Husbandry, of Fawn Grove, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting strikes among railroad employees, coal miners, and sympathetic strikes, and for the enforcement of the present laws against illegal and unjust labor agitators, rioters, and inciters to violence against men who wish to work, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the boroughs of Mount Olivet and St. Clair, in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2782) for the purchase of the embassy building and grounds of the United States at Santiago, Chile, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 3187) to dispose of a certain strip of public land in Waterville, Me., reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3417) to authorize the Railroad Administration to determine by arbitration the rental value of the Cape Cod Canal; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3418) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the lading or unlading of vessels at night, the preliminary entry of vessels, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1911; to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOSEPH C. BOGGS.

On motion of Mr. SWANSON, it was—

Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 1418, Sixty-third Congress, for the relief of Joseph C. Boggs, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to reservation No. 3, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, yesterday when we approached the hour of 5 o'clock, anticipating that a recess would be taken, I discontinued my remarks with an argument half completed. I am sorry that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], my very good friend, did not wait until I had completed the subject, because I think if he had he would not have found much occasion to disagree with me.

I am not interested in any controversy or discussion with my friend further than this: I am unwilling that my position should be wrongly stated to the country. In the impetuosity of debate, and particularly when feeling is tense, we are all very likely to be impressed with some particular statement to the exclusion of its context. I think that is the occasion for nearly all the criticism of the Senator. Very briefly now I desire to refer to his remarks merely for the purpose of setting the record right.

In the first place he accused me of bitterly assailing the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and of charging that he had said that merely because ex-Senator Root had made a statement that statement bound the United States.

Mr. President, the words are in the RECORD. I shall not consume the time of the Senate to reread them, but taking all that I said together it amounted to this: I was repudiating the doctrine that any man, even the President of the United States himself, except when acting within the purview of his official authority duly granted by the Constitution and laws of the United States, could bind the Government of the United States to any policy or commit it, and as an extreme illustration of the doctrine which had been announced I said that four times it had been stated with great emphasis, indeed those who were here will remember with great vehemence, that Elihu Root had said we ought to stay over in Europe for five years.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. As I was compelled to leave the Chamber yesterday, I wondered if it developed who Mr. Root represents, if anybody, at this time, that he should declare the public policy of the United States?

Mr. REED. There was nothing said about it. Of course, we all know that ex-Senator Root is a distinguished citizen of the United States, formerly a Senator; he is a very able lawyer; and it appears that he was handed the German treaty for examination some weeks before the Senate of the United States was favored with it, and that it passed into his hands through an international banker, who is now advocating the organization of a great corporation to refinance Europe and control the shipment of goods to Europe.

Mr. McCORMICK. The same international banker who has been nominated by Stephen Lausanne for viceroy of Constantinople.

Mr. REED. I am not attacking former Senator Root; I do not care what his connections are; whether his connections are with financial interests or whether he has no such connections or whether his utterance was the patriotic voice of his soul or whether it was not. I prefer to assume that it was his opinion honestly expressed; but the point I make is that no individual can bind the Government of the United States or its people. The people speak through representatives whose power to commit this Government is limited by the authority granted to them by the people in the Constitution.

Regarding the next proposition that I call attention to I am much more seriously concerned. I refer to the declaration of the Senator from Arkansas, in effect, that I had argued that the United States ought not to have entered this war at all; that we should have remained neutral. I read what the Senator said:

> The whole course of the Senator's argument was to the effect that the doctrine of neutrality was the right doctrine, and that the United States ought to have stayed out of the war.

Again, he said:

> But, Mr. President, the whole course of his argument—
> That is, my argument—
> was to the effect that from the beginning of the war Germany had been disregarding our rights, and that we ought to have entered the war, if we were going to, sooner than we did enter it, in the interest of civilization.

Mr. President, neither of those statements is accurate. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read at length what I said regarding this matter. I shall content myself with the reading of a paragraph or two and with a simple word of explanation.

What I stated was that, if the doctrine now asserted that it is the duty of the United States to establish democracy throughout the world, if the allegation now made that it is the business of the United States to go into Europe and to stay in Europe and to compel Europe to live according to our ideas is true, that if it be true to-day, as is now alleged, that it was our duty to enter the war to save the world for democracy, and, therefore, that it is our duty to stay in Europe forever, then it was true long before we entered the war. I am denying that it is true to-day, as I am denying that it was true then. I am asserting that we did the proper thing when we stayed out of the war up to the time we entered it; and I am asserting that we should upon the conclusion of the war and upon having vindicated our right have returned to our home.

I do not say there may not be certain things that we ought to desire to have accomplished; I am not combating details; I shall discuss that question a little more at length. What I am asserting is that this broad doctrine that it is our business now to engage in setting up a supergovernment of the world and to pledge the lives and fortunes of our people to the maintenance of that government is contrary to every word that was written before we entered the war.

Now, what did I say? I am going merely to read a paragraph or two to show how unfair the criticism of the Senator was.

In commenting upon the devastation of Belgium, I said:

> I believed in the doctrine of neutrality. Yet I say, if we ever were to commit ourselves to the philosophy that it is our business to protect the world and to rescue the people of the world, then Theodore Roosevelt was right in what he said, and we should have acted then.

Again, I said, after the Lusitania had been sunk that—

> If we never knew before, we knew then that democracy was in peril. If we did not know it then, there was nothing that ever happened afterwards to show it to us. If it was our duty to interfere on behalf of the democracy of the world and the civilization of the world, those things that are rolled now in platitudinous volume from the lips of orators, were then apparent to all the world. Yet, sir, we did not enter the contest. We maintained neutrality in thought and deed as nearly as we could. Although the American people were being killed in that way, yet we adhered to these policies.

Again, I said:

> But, sir, if the doctrine that it was our business to enter to make the world safe for democracy; if the doctrine that it was our business to enter in order to set up new governments; if the doctrine that it was our business to establish in the world a new order of things is true to-day, it was just as true then, for Germany's fell purpose and hellish appetite was as well manifested then as it ever was. It was not our doctrine, as I shall show you. It was not the doctrine of the President.

Then I proceeded to read numerous quotations from the President, one of which I omitted and will put it in at this point.

In a speech before the New York Federation of Churches on January 27, 1916, the President said:

> The passion of America is to be permitted to live her own life according to her own principle. The only thing that she profoundly resents or will ever profoundly resent is having her life and freedom interfered with. These are the terms of self-respect upon which to deal with one another as individuals, and those are the terms of self-respect upon which nations deal with one another.

So, Mr. President, while it is not very important, I think I ought to say so much in order to clarify the situation. I have no quarrel with the Senator from Arkansas, although he seems to be particularly irritated when I say anything on this subject.

Mr. President, I called attention on yesterday, not from any light purpose or for any partisan reason, to the fact that we all cheered the wonderful speech for neutrality that was made by Gov. Glynn in the Democratic convention. I said, turning to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, that they cheered—I do not remember the exact words I used in describing it—I cheered, we all cheered, sir, we all indorsed that doctrine; and we indorsed it, as I said on yesterday, when the German heel was upon the breast of France and of Belgium and when her sword was at their throats. We indorsed it for the reasons that were given in the nominating speech, for reasons that were given in other speeches made in the convention, and for reasons given by the President in accepting a second nomination. The whole point that I am arguing is this, that the doctrine "of saving Europe" and "saving democracy" and setting up "a government to rule the world" is a thing that was born, so far as the President is concerned, after we entered the war. Yet the occurrences that pointed the fell purpose of Germany had occurred before that time, with the single exception so far as we were concerned that just before we declared war she threw the glove squarely in our face and challenged us to mortal combat.

Let me pause here to say, lest I may forget it later on, that the intimation that I stood for neutrality at that time I know my friend from Arkansas did not mean to make, for he will remember, I think, that before the President asked permission to arm our merchant ships, when he came here to the Capitol much agitated because of the change in the German policy, and told us of their repudiation of the agreement with regard to submarine warfare, when the President called in Senators to consultation in a semipublic way in his room but a few yards from where I stand, I was one of the Senators who, along with the Senator from Arkansas, said that I believed the time had come for serious action, and that if the President thought he needed congressional legislation I was ready to stand for it, and I did stand for it; and, Mr. President, when we could not get a vote on the measure providing for the arming of merchant ships because the bill was brought forward in the last days of the session and speeches consumed the time, I was one of the 75 Senators who signed the round robin, along, I think, with my friend from Arkansas, for I know he signed it if he was here.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wrote it.

Mr. REED. And I signed it. We signed it because we wanted to certify to the world that there was a solidarity of sentiment; that the time had come when this Government would no longer tolerate a violation of its rights.

I made a speech for the war, I voted for the war, I voted to give the President every soldier he asked, every ship he asked, every dollar he asked. The Senator did not mean, of course, to impute any other motive to me than that I was ready to go on with the war when the time came. I changed my mind about the question of staying out of the war, I guess, at about the same identical time that all of us did, because Germany did a particular act.

I am leading up to that, but I want to call attention to the further events of the convention, because I want to settle for all time that it was our policy to remain out of this struggle until the moment that Germany forced us in by the act to which I have already referred and to which I shall refer again.

Let me see if I can not further emphasize what I said yesterday by the words I am about to read. This is the speech of the great Senator who presided over the Democratic national convention, made at the convention. I refer to our lamented friend, Senator Ollie James:

No President during the life of this Republic has ever had to deal with so many delicate and dangerous problems as those which have confronted President Wilson during the last two years of his incumbency in office. [Applause.] With more than half of the world in arms in Europe, with Mexico in revolution at our border, these difficult and complicated international problems have confronted him almost daily, and he has handled them as becomes a patriot and a statesman. [Applause.] When the Lusitania was sunk the militant voice of Theodore Roosevelt cried out for war, and if he had been President of the United States at that time to-day 500,000 brave American sons would be contending around the forts of Verdun in this mighty maelstrom of blood—thousands would have been buried in the ditches. Our President, patient, patriotic, far-sighted, the real statesman, handled this question with the greatest ability, and won for America its greatest diplomatic victory. [Applause.]

We all joined in that applause.

Some gentlemen in Congress undertook to take out of the President's hands the right of handling our foreign situation. Congress met that quickly, decisively, and said that they stood, as every American should stand, back of the President of the United States. [Applause.] When the President sent his ultimatum to Germany he was criticized by two elements—one contending that he was seeking to force the country into war and the other that he was too cowardly to engage in the conflict. There are happily two kinds of courage—the courage of the man who is willing to undertake the danger himself and the courage of the man that sends others to the conflict.

The latter is the kind of courage we are manifesting when we ratify this league of nations.

The courage of the man who wishes himself to enter the conflict may be rash, for he alone is to suffer, but the courage to take a nation into war, where millions of lives may be sacrificed, is another kind of courage. [Applause.] It is a courage that must be able to stand bitter abuse; a courage that moves slowly, acts coolly, and strikes no blow as long as diplomacy may be employed, the honor of the country upheld, the flag respected, and the lives of Americans protected. [Applause.] Woodrow Wilson has both kinds of courage—the courage of conflict and the courage to act coolly and sensibly when he is dealing with the lives of others—the fate of a nation. [Applause.] It was no time for divided counsel. The interference of Congress would have created chaos in this country, contempt for our honor and our country abroad, and would have destroyed the power of America to either maintain its honor or protect the rights of the neutrals of the world. [Applause.]

Then the Senator proceeded to discuss our conduct in the Mexican situation.

There are other statements of this great orator which I might read, but I pass on. It was another one of the great speeches of the Democratic convention which determined the policy of that convention.

Mr. President, the same orator, Senator James, was the head of the delegation sent to formally notify President Wilson of his renomination; and the President in his address in response, carefully written, carefully prepared, certainly wrote the thing that was in his heart; he surely must have expressed the honest sentiments of his soul. I repeat, so that I may not be misunderstood, the point I am arguing now is "that this doctrine that it is our business to save the democracy of the world and to impose our will upon mankind is a new doctrine, born after the war occurred."

Let me read what the President said:

In foreign affairs we have been guided by principles clearly conceived and consistently lived up to. Perhaps they have not been fully comprehended because they have hitherto governed international affairs only in theory, not in practice. They are simple, obvious, easily stated, and fundamental to American ideals.

We have been neutral not only because it was the fixed and traditional policy of the United States to stand aloof from the politics of Europe and because we had no part either of action or of policy in the influences which brought on the present war, but also because it was manifestly our duty to prevent, if it were possible, the indefinite extension of the fires of hate and desolation kindled by that terrible conflict and seek to serve mankind by reserving our strength and our resources for the anxious and difficult days of restoration and healing which must follow when peace will have to build its house anew.

The rights of our own citizens, of course, became involved; that was inevitable. Where they did, this was our guiding principle: That property rights can be vindicated by claims for damages when the war is over, and no modern nation can decline to arbitrate such claims, but the fundamental rights of humanity can not be. The loss of life is irreparable. Neither can direct violations of a nation's sovereignty await vindication in suits for damages. The nation that violates these essential rights must expect to be checked and called to account by direct challenge and resistance.

That is exactly the ground on which we afterwards entered the war.

The nation that violates these essential rights must expect to be checked and called to account by direct challenge and resistance. It at once makes the quarrel in part our own. These are plain principles, and we have never lost sight of them or departed from them, whatever the stress or the perplexity of circumstances or the provocation of hasty resentment. The record is clear and consistent throughout and stands distinct and definite for anyone to judge who wishes to know the truth about it.

The seas were not broad enough to keep the infection of the conflict out of our own politics. The passions and intrigues of certain active groups and combinations of men amongst us who were born under foreign flags injected the poison of disloyalty into our own most critical affairs, laid violent hands upon many of our industries, and subjected us to the shame of divisions of sentiment and purpose in which America was contemned and forgotten. It is part of the business of the year of reckoning and settlement to speak plainly and act with unmistakable purpose in rebuke of these things in order that they may be forever hereafter impossible. I am the candidate of a party, but I am above all things else an American citizen. I neither seek the favor nor fear the displeasure of that small allen element amongst us which puts loyalty to any foreign power before loyalty to the United States.

It is important in considering these words, Senators, to remember that the President at that time had in mind the outrages that had been perpetrated within our own borders, the conspiracies of the German Government that had already been unearthed, manifest wrongs that had been perpetrated upon our commerce upon the seas, the wickedness of the sinking of the Lusitania, the cruelties and brutalities that had defaced the world and placed an indelible stain upon the character of the German Government. All these passed in review before his mind, and yet he announced the doctrine of neutrality, and declared that unless we were directly assailed it was our business to abide the day of settlement subsequent to the war. This I say in reply to some remarks made yesterday to the effect that it was because of the discovery of German intrigue in this country that we were forced into the war. That was known to the President when he accepted the nomination, and the fact is proven by his address of acceptance, which I have just read.

Mr. President, as we proceeded with the campaign we assured the American people that the traditional policy of noninterference with the affairs of Europe, the traditional policy that we would not entangle ourselves in alliances, would still be the guiding principle of those occupying the Government if they were continued in power.

The Democratic convention was held in June, 1916. A few days before the convention sat and on April 13, 1916, the President in an address at the Jefferson Day banquet at Washington declared:

Gentlemen, are you ready for the test? God forbid that we should ever become directly or indirectly embroiled in quarrels not of our own choosing and that do not affect what we feel responsible to defend. But, if we should ever be drawn in, are you ready to go in only where the interests of America are coincident with the interests of mankind and to draw out the moment the interest centers in America and is narrowed from the wide circle of humanity? Are you ready for the test?

During the campaign the President continued to advocate the doctrine of noninterference. In a speech at Shadow Lawn on September 30, 1916, he said:

The certain prospect of the success of the Republican Party is that we shall be drawn, in one form or other, into the embroilments of the European war.

On January 22, 1917, the President delivered to Congress his celebrated message, "Peace Without Victory," in which he demanded or suggested that war ought to cease in Europe without anybody being victorious, although Germany had then invaded France and had her battle line within a few miles of the capital of the French Republic.

I think it will be serviceable if I attempt to set forth what we understand them to be.

They imply first of all that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

That was on January 22, 1917, only a few months before we entered the war. Countless atrocities had then been committed. The black page was spread before the world. The danger to the democracy of the world, if it was ever manifest, was manifest now, and yet the President, adhering, as he had the right to adhere, to the doctrine of neutrality, was advocating "peace without victory." I did not then think the address would do any good. I did not think peace without victory was possible. Living in this practical, work-a-day world, I was sure, if somebody was not whipped in the war, and soundly whipped, a peace would only be but an armistice, soon to be broken, certain to again engulf the world in the horrors of war.

I am seeking for the present merely to show and to show by the record that we entered this war in self-defense. I want to dissipate, if I can, the false claims that are now being made that we entered this war for a multitude of reasons, those reasons being limited only by the vain imaginings of men whose fertile brains seek to conjure up reasons to sustain their present desires.

A brief résumé of the facts appears to be necessary. The German Navy had almost from the beginning of the war been sinking our ships on the high seas. On May 8, 1916, Mr. Lansing had sent a note to the German Government in which he called attention again to these wrongs and replied to the German note of May 4. In that note the German Government had declared that it—

Is prepared to do its utmost to confine the operations of war for the rest of its duration to the fighting forces of the belligerents.

Mr. Lansing construed it as meaning that the German Government is determined to impose upon all the commanders at sea the limitations of the recognized rules of international law upon which the Government of the United States has insisted. Mr. Lansing went on to say:

Throughout the months that have elapsed since the Imperial Government announced on February 4, 1915, its submarine policy, now happily abandoned, the Government of the United States has been constantly guided and restrained by motives of friendship in its patient effort to bring about an amicable settlement of critical questions arising from that policy.

Accepting the Imperial Government's declaration of its abandonment of the policy which has so seriously menaced the good relations between the two countries, the Government of the United States will rely upon a scrupulous execution henceforth of the new altered policy of the Imperial Government, such as will remove the principal danger to and interruption of the relations existing between the United States and Germany.

The Government of the United States feels it necessary to state that it takes it for granted that the Imperial German Government does not intend to imply that the maintenance of its newly announced policy is in any way contingent upon the result of diplomatic negotiations between the Government of the United States and any other belligerent Government, notwithstanding the fact that certain passages in the Imperial Government's note of the 14th instant might appear to be susceptible of that construction

In order, however, to avoid any possible misunderstanding the Government of the United States notifies the Imperial German Government that it can not for a moment entertain, much less discuss, a suggestion that respect by the German naval authorities for the rights of the United States upon the high seas should in any way or in the slightest degree be made contingent upon the conduct of any other Government affecting the rights of neutrals and combatants. Responsibility in such matters is single, not joint; absolute, not relative.

That note was sent on May 8, 1916, and everybody remembers that the world was suddenly startled on the 31st day of January, 1917, by the announcement of the German Government that after the 1st day of February, to wit, the very next day, it would adopt a policy with regard to the use of submarines against all shipping seeking to pass through certain designated areas of the high seas over which, under the law of nations, every vessel had the right to proceed. It was because of that fact that the President appeared before Congress.

The notice of Germany was plain. She had mapped out the ocean in lanes. She had told us that she would graciously permit our vessels to pass through those certain lanes under certain conditions, and that if they went outside they would be liable to be sunk in a moment. And yet, sir, with that insult directly leveled at us, with the repudiation of its pledge thrown at our feet by Germany, with the notice that we were warned from the seas ringing in our ears, we still did not abandon our policy of neutrality. We had not yet discovered the new doctrine that it was the business of the United States to save Europe and make the world safe for democracy. We stood squarely upon the old rock that the fathers had occupied, that it is the business of this country to remain outside of European conflicts until and unless we have exhausted every honorable means to escape entering. So the President sought to exhaust the last of those means. Did he come to us and ask us to make war? He did not. He still hoped for peace. In his address to the Congress, after reciting the things that had transpired, he declared:

I have therefore directed the Secretary of State to announce to his excellency the German ambassador that all diplomatic relations between the United States and the German Empire are severed, and that the American ambassador at Berlin will immediately be withdrawn; and, in accordance with this decision, to hand to his excellency his passports.

Notwithstanding this unexpected action of the German Government, this sudden and deeply deplorable renunciation of its assurances given this Government at one of the most critical moments of tension in the relations of the two Governments, I refuse to believe that it is the intention of the German authorities to do in fact what they have warned us they will feel at liberty to do. I can not bring myself to believe that they will indeed pay no regard to the ancient friendship between their people and our own, or to the solemn obligations which have been exchanged between them, and destroy American ships and take the lives of American citizens in the willful prosecution of the ruthless naval program they have announced their intention to adopt. Only actual overt acts on their part can make me believe it even now.

And so, sir, we waited for the overt act. As a protest clearly indicating what our action would be if Germany carried her threat into execution, we gave, and we properly gave, to the German ambassador his passports; but with full notice of all the atrocities, I repeat, that had occurred, with the bloody page before our eyes, with the smoke of burning cities ascending to heaven to warn us of the German menace—with all these things, and with the repudiation of Germany's promise to us heaped on top of them, we still adhered to the policy of the Democratic convention, the policy of the fathers, the policy to which we were committed.

The President said, in substance, "we will wait your overt act," and we did. He continued:

If this inveterate confidence on my part in the sobriety and prudent foresight of their purpose should unhappily prove unfounded, if American ships and American lives should be in fact sacrificed by their naval commanders in heedless contravention of the just and reasonable understandings of international law and the obvious dictates of humanity, I shall take the liberty of coming again before the Congress to ask that authority be given me to use any means that may be necessary for the protection of our seamen and our people in the prosecution of their peaceful and legitimate errands on the high seas. I can do nothing less. I take it for granted that all neutral Governments will take the same course.

We do not desire any hostile conflict with the Imperial German Government. We are the sincere friends of the German people and earnestly desire to remain at peace with the Government which speaks for them. We shall not believe that they are hostile to us unless and until we are obliged to believe it; and we purpose nothing more than the reasonable defense of the undoubted rights of our people.

Let me read that last clause again:

And we purpose nothing more than the reasonable defense of the undoubted rights of our people. We wish to serve no selfish ends. We seek merely to stand true alike in thought and in action to the immemorial principles of our people, which I sought to express in my address to the Senate only two weeks ago—seek merely to vindicate our right to liberty and justice and an unmolested right. These are the bases of peace, not war. God grant we may not be challenged to defend them by acts of willful injustice on the part of the Government of Germany.

Do you find anything there about making the world safe for democracy? Do you find anything in those words that can be construed into the voice of God calling the American people to regenerate the earth, to change the Governments that have existed? Is there aught in all this language to indicate anything except that, notwithstanding the horrors of the European conflict, we still would remain out, although Germany had by her manifesto or by her statements thrown the glove in our faces yet she had not followed that with a blow at the heart, and we awaited that blow?

This brings us, sir, very near the time of the struggle—February 3, 1917. Then, on February 26, 1917, 23 days afterwards—three weeks of fateful time—the President came before Congress. Did he then demand war? No. Did he then say we must make the world safe for democracy? No. Did he say that Germany's outrages on the world can no longer be borne, that the German atrocities cried to high heaven and we of the earth must hear the voice? No. Even then, three weeks having passed, and German submarines during all the time being engaged in sinking the vessels of other nations, Germany having refused in the slightest degree to modify her policy toward us, the President did not yet demand war. The overt act had not yet come. So, on February 26, he again addressed Congress. He referred to the unexpected action of the Imperial German Government in declaring its intention to disregard the promises she had made to our Government in April last—April a year before—and he said, and I think I ought to read it here:

On the 3d of February I officially informed you of the sudden and unexpected action of the Imperial German Government in declaring its intention to disregard the promises it had made to this Government in April last and undertake immediate submarine operations against all commerce, whether of belligerents or of neutrals, that should seek to approach Great Britain and Ireland, the Atlantic coasts of Europe, or the harbors of the eastern Mediterranean, and to conduct those operations without regard to the established restrictions of international practice, without regard to any considerations of humanity even which might interfere with their object. That policy was forthwith put into practice. It has now been in active execution for nearly four weeks.

Its practical results are not yet fully disclosed. The commerce of other neutral nations is suffering severely, but not, perhaps, very much more severely than it was already suffering before the 1st of February, when the new policy of the Imperial Government was put into operation. We have asked the cooperation of the other neutral Governments to prevent these depredations, but so far none of them has thought it wise to join us in any common course of action. Our own commerce has suffered, is suffering, rather in apprehension than in fact, rather because so many of our ships are timidly keeping to their home ports than because American ships have been sunk.

I presented the President's February 26, 1917, message for the purpose of showing that at that late day the President was not in favor of making war for the democracy of the world; that at that late day his policy was still the policy he had adhered to throughout, that the United States would remain out of this conflict unless forced to enter by direct insult or attack.

I continue reading:

Two American vessels have been sunk, the Housatonic and the Lyman M. Law. The case of the Housatonic, which was carrying foodstuffs consigned to a London firm, was essentially like the case of the Frye, in which, it will be recalled, the German Government admitted its liability for damages, and the lives of the crew, as in the case of the Frye, were safeguarded with reasonable care. The case of the Law, which was carrying lemon-box staves to Palermo, disclosed a ruthlessness of method which deserves grave condemnation, but was accompanied by no circumstances which might not have been expected at any time in connection with the use of the submarine against merchantmen as the German Government has used it.

In sum, therefore, the situation we find ourselves in with regard to the actual conduct of the German submarine warfare against commerce and its effects upon our own ships and people is substantially the same that it was when I addressed you on the 3d of February, except for the tying up of our shipping in our own ports because of the unwillingness of our shipowners to risk their vessels at sea without insurance or adequate protection, and the very serious congestion of our commerce which has resulted, a congestion which is growing rapidly more and more serious every day. This in itself might presently accomplish, in effect, what the new German submarine orders were meant to accomplish, so far as we are concerned. We can only say, therefore, that the overt act which I have ventured to hope the German commanders would in fact avoid had not occurred.

But, while this is happily true, it must be admitted that there have been certain additional indications and expressions of purpose on the part of the German press and the German authorities which have increased rather than lessened the impression that if our ships and our people are spared it will be because of fortunate circumstances or because the commanders of the German submarines which they may happen to encounter exercise an unexpected discretion and restraint rather than because of the instructions under which those commanders are acting. It would be foolish to deny that the situation is fraught with the gravest possibilities and dangers. No thoughtful man can fail to see that the necessity for definite action may come at any time, if we are in fact, and not in word merely, to defend our elementary rights as a neutral nation. It would be most imprudent to be unprepared.

What are we calling for here? Power to defend our elemental rights as a Nation; power to defend our shipping; power to see to it that citizens of the United States can sail the seas without being sent to the bottom.

The President continues:

I can not in such circumstances be unmindful of the fact that the expiration of the term of the present Congress is immediately at hand, by constitutional limitation; and that it would in all likelihood require an unusual length of time to assemble and organize the Congress which is to succeed it. I feel that I ought, in view of that fact, to obtain from you full and immediate assurance of the authority which I may need at any moment to exercise. No doubt I already possess that authority without special warrant of law, by the plain implication of my constitutional duties and powers; but I prefer, in the present circumstances, not to act upon general implication. I wish to feel that the authority and the power of the Congress are behind me in whatever it may become necessary for me to do. We are jointly the servants of the people and must act together and in their spirit, so far as we can divine and interpret it.

No one doubts what it is our duty to do.

Now, here is our duty outlined. Let us see if it was to democratize the world. Let us see if it was to make new maps. Let us see if it was to stay in Europe indefinitely and organize a society to control all other nations. Let us see if it was to pledge our sons to die in the quarrels of other countries, as is solemnly provided in article 10:

No one doubts what it is our duty to do. We must defend our commerce and the lives of our people in the midst of the present trying circumstances, with discretion but with clear and steadfast purpose. Only the method and the extent remain to be chosen, upon the occasion, if occasion should indeed arise. Since it has unhappily proved impossible to safeguard our neutral rights by diplomatic means against the unwarranted infringements they are suffering at the hands of Germany, there may be no recourse but to armed neutrality, which we shall know how to maintain and for which there is abundant American precedent.

Armed neutrality as a last resort; not war to regenerate mankind, not war to control all peoples, nations, kindreds, and tongues, but, at that late hour, armed neutrality to protect our commerce, our ships, and our people; and if that had been successful there would have been no entrance into this war.

It is devoutly to be hoped that it will not be necessary to put armed force anywhere into action. The American people do not desire it, and our desire is not different from theirs. I am sure that they will understand the spirit in which I am now acting, the purpose I hold nearest my heart and would wish to exhibit in everything I do. I am anxious that the people of the nations at war also should understand and not mistrust us. I hope that I need give no further proofs and assurances that I have already given throughout nearly three years of anxious patience that I am the friend of peace and mean to preserve it for America so long as I am able. I am not now proposing or contemplating war or any steps that need lead to it. I merely request that you will accord me by your own vote and definite bestowal the means and the authority to safeguard in practice the right of a great people who are at peace and who are desirous of exercising none but the rights of peace to follow the pursuits of peace in quietness and good will—rights recognized time out of mind by all the civilized nations of the world. No course of my choosing or of theirs will lead to war. War can come only by the willful acts and aggressions of others.

It appears that afterwards the President changed his mind.

At a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate with the President, on August 19, 1919, the subject under discussion being the league of nations, the following colloquy between Senator McCUMBER and the President took place:

Senator McCUMBER. Would our moral conviction of the unrighteousness of the German war have brought us into this war if Germany had not committed any acts against us without the league of nations, as we had no league of nations at that time?

The PRESIDENT. I suppose it would eventually, Senator, as things developed.

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens we would have gotten into the war?

The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that we would have gotten in anyway?

The PRESIDENT. I do.

But, this, I repeat, was not his opinion before we entered the war. That has already been sufficiently demonstrated.

A little further on in his address of February 26, 1917, the President said:

I am thinking not only of the right of Americans to go and come about their proper business by way of the sea but also of something much deeper, much more fundamental than that. I am thinking of those rights of humanity without which there is no civilization. My theme is of those great principles of compassion and of protection which mankind has sought to throw about human lives, the lives of noncombatants, the lives of men who are peacefully at work keeping the industrial processes of the world quick and vital, the lives of women and children and of those who supply the labor which ministers to their sustenance. We are speaking of no selfish material rights but of rights which our hearts support, and whose foundation is that righteous passion for justice upon which all law, all structures alike of family, of State, and of mankind must rest, as upon the ultimate base of our existence and our liberty. I can not imagine any man with American principles at his heart hesitating to defend these things.

Mr. President, the armed-ship bill failed, but the President proceeded to arm the ships under his general authority.

Then, only a few days later, on March 5, came the President's inaugural address, and I find this in it:

We stand firm in armed neutrality, since it seems that in no other way we can demonstrate what it is we insist upon and can not forego. We may even be drawn on, by circumstances, not by our own purpose or desire, to a more active assertion of our rights as we see them and a more immediate association with the great struggle itself. But nothing will alter our thought or our purpose. They are too clear to be obscured. They are too deeply rooted in the principle of our national life to be altered. We desire neither conquest nor advantage. We wish nothing that can be had only at the cost of another people. We have always professed unselfish purpose and we covet the opportunity to prove that our professions are sincere.

In this address he outlined the desire for limitation of national armaments, and so forth, and then said:

That the community of interest and of power upon which peace must henceforth depend imposes upon each nation the duty of seeing to it that all influences proceeding from its own citizens meant to encourage or assist revolution in other States should be sternly and effectually suppressed and prevented.

That brings us, Mr. President, up to the 4th of March. Congress was speedily assembled after that, and on the 2d of April, 1917, the President made an address before Congress. I am coming now to the address in which the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is so interested. I will read any parts of it to which he calls my attention. I do not intend to read the entire address, not because it is not a splendid state paper, but it is a public document, and need not all be repeated. He said:

I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the 1st day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meager and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people can not be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a Nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are, in effect, outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks, as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavor to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making; we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs. It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the Nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the Navy in all respects, but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training. It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well conceived taxation.

Now I omit a part, interesting as it is. He continues:

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world, what our motives and our objects are.

My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the Nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3d of February and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I have been following the Senator; I do not wish to flatter him, but I am following him with interest. If that language does not clearly imply that after having assisted the other civilized nations of the world in terminating this menace to civilization that we are going to continue to assist them until they are on their feet what does the language mean?

Mr. REED. It does not mean either of the things——

Mr. ASHURST. What does it mean?

Mr. REED. It does not mean either of the things that the Senator draws from it. The thing with its context and with all that precedes is his declaration that he has not changed his views from what they were, and simply means this, that Germany has violated the law of nations, and having violated the law of nations and injured us, we and all other nations had a common interest in vindicating the principles of justice in the life of the world. In other words, Germany had violated that law and knew that we were coming to war with Germany to fight for it. If any man can get out of that language the idea that we proposed to go over in Europe and change the map and stay there, then he has a power of construction that I do not possess. To my mind the question is not debatable. Taken in connection with its context, it does not mean what the Senator from Arizona thinks it means.

He goes on to say:

Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved.

In other words, he says that Germany has been at this war all these years and had been perpetrating these outrages all of these years and had finally violated our rights. The President was summoning the nations of the world to whip Germany, and it was very adroitly and splendidly done, but it pledged us to nothing. If he had attempted to so pledge us he could not have done it. The President by making a speech in Congress can not pledge this Nation. I say that with all the respect in the world for him. The King of England by making a speech to Parliament can not pledge the British Nation. The Emperor of Germany could not pledge the German Nation by making a speech.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. What did he ask us to do? He asked us to declare that Germany had made war on us. I have already read that——

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Will the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I know the Senator does not mean to infer that I even harbor such a fantastic idea as that anybody's speech, be he President or Senator or private citizen, could make any pledge that would bind the people. The President's address, as I conceive it, upon that occasion was simply an argument——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. One of the many arguments as to why we should go to war.

I call attention at this point to the fact that the President said upon that occasion, in the line which the Senator just read:

Set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert and purpose of action as will henceforth——

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. ASHURST (reading)—

henceforth insure the observance of those principles.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. ASHURST. And if the Senator does not object, I would like to call his attention to another paragraph.

Mr. REED. I do not object, of course.

Mr. ASHURST. It is a paragraph some 20 lines below and which reads:

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion.

Mr. REED. Is that what you are getting up now—a partnership of opinion?

Mr. ASHURST. I am not getting up anything.

Mr. REED. Oh, is that what the league of nations is—a mere partnership of opinion?

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, if the Senator wants to have my opinion, if it is worth anything, I would be glad to give it. I simply say this: I was trying in my feeble way to point out that in the President's address of April 2, 1917, which was only an argument that the President had the constitutional right to make, the President was pointing out, or at least trying to point out, that in order to preserve the peace of the world a concert of free nations was to be brought about, and that there must be a community of thought and opinion as to how the peace of the world should be preserved.

I respectfully assert that nobody was entrapped, after the war had begun, in the idea that we were making the world safe for freedom, because in the President's message of April 2 he used that phrase, "We are going into the war to make the world safe for democracy."

Mr. REED. Oh, no. Where is that?

Mr. ASHURST. The world must be made safe for democracy.

Mr. REED. Where is that? I want to get the context.

Mr. ASHURST. I would not be so unfair in debate as to wrench one sentence from its context——

Mr. REED. Oh, I am not thinking that at all. The Senator must exculpate me from that.

Mr. ASHURST. I am interested in the Senator's address because the charge has been reiterated over and over again with considerable force and considerable eloquence in various places that after we got into the war and after the soldiers were in the field and after the enormous expenditure was brought about, then suddenly, just like Minerva from the brow of Jove, there sprung from the President the idea that now I repudiate all that I have formerly said and we are going to work to make the world safe for peace.

I assert here that if a Senator had risen in the Senate when we were debating the war declaration and said, "Mr. President, I do not believe in making war for Serbia; I do not believe in making war for Belgium; I believe in making war simply and solely in order to protect American rights," that that Senator could stand up to-day and argue. But having, when one of his colleagues objected to the war declaration, stated that his colleague went perilously near to treason, the Senator was so earnest for war himself; he knew what the message was; he knew that we were not only going into this war to protect American rights but we had announced to the world this was a war to protect liberty and civilization, whether it be in the antipodes or in America. Surely nobody was deceived as to that.

I am trying if I can to break the force of the Senator's argument. He is trying to make the point that the President suddenly shifted his bearings, suddenly shifted his course from one direction to another. The Senator is one of the ablest lawyers in the country. He can not, in my judgment, however, with his great eloquence, his superb eloquence, and his ingenuity, convince the country that we went into the war simply and solely and only to protect American rights. The President said at the time, and said in numerous speeches after we went into the war, that we were not only in to protect American rights but to protect all civilization as well. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has absolutely proven my case. If there is any difference between us, it may be a difference of 10 days in time.

I have gone through the records and have shown that the President, as late as the 26th day of February, had reiterated that our purpose was to defend our own rights, and brought the matter up to the very day that Congress adjourned. I have shown that to have been his position without the least shadow of turning.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me conclude what I was saying.

Now comes the President and calls Congress to declare war, in that he asserts, and I read the language, that our purpose is no different than the purpose as outlined in his previous message, namely, to defend our rights and vindicate our honor, but in the course of his argument he goes on then to denounce the Imperial German Government, the purposes of the Imperial German Government, to say that it is assailing the rights of men everywhere, and to call upon the democracies of the world to assist. Of course, if we were going into the war, the President very properly would want to bring in everybody else he could on our side, as is shown by the messages I have just read. He had already consulted with other neutral powers and asked them to join with us. As the Senator knows, they failed to join with us to any extent that made any difference, and we carried the war along.

Of course, the President did utter some language here which, taken from its context, could be twisted into a declaration by the President at that time that he had some other object in view. But I repeat that if he had it in view and if he made his speech, it bound nobody; it did not bind——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me continue for a moment, please.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has been very kind; I realize that.

Mr. REED. It did not bind me and it did not bind the Congress, no matter what he recommended, no matter what views he expressed.

Let me show you to what a foolish extent we would go if we were to take that view of it. Did we bind ourselves to this expression of opinion?

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added—

I am reading now immediately after the part that has been read by the Senator from Arizona—to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off, and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their naïve majesty and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a league of honor.

Did we bind ourselves to that, when Russia had broken her honor, when Bolshevism had reared its ugly head, and assassins were gaining control and anarchy was unfolding its red flag? Of course, the President did not know that at the time. If he had he would not have said this. But did that bind the American Nation or the world? Congress does not act in that way; the American people do not act by virtue of some man's argument. That is what I am talking about. The President's message was entitled to great consideration by us; we ought to have weighed every part of it; and we did. We were not called upon to stand here on the floor at a time like that and cavil at anything that was said. It was our business to act; and what did he ask us to do? He asked us not to declare war, but to declare that Germany had made war on us. That was the sum total of it. So, up to the very time I am speaking of our policy had been one of neutrality, and then of armed neutrality. Finally the President said to us the fateful hour had come; that Germany had violated not only her agreements but had followed that violence by overt acts; and that it was clear that the hour had come when we must go to our defense. Then he summoned the kingdoms, the nations, and tongues—and he did right when he did it—and tried to get every aid which he could. I do not agree with the part of it——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield at this time?

Mr. REED. I will yield for a question.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator read the last paragraph of the President's message? I know he will be glad to do so.

Mr. REED. Of that particular message?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. REED. I will read that when I come to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Before the Senator reads that, if he will let me say it again, I desire to repeat that while I have great respect for anything any President may say, I again assert that what an Executive may say is only an argument, as a Senator might argue; but I do assert, if the Senator will pardon me, that the President in his message of April 2 reiterated that we were going to war to protect the rights of smaller nations as well as our own rights.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator read the last paragraph of that message?

Mr. REED. I will read it. I am willing to read the whole message; I am willing to have it blazoned on the dome of the Capitol. Among other things, I read this:

We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

That was our only reason for entering the war. The Senator from Arizona will not get much consolation for his theory out of that sentence.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not looking for consolation.

Mr. REED. Well, for his theory. The President continues:

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck.

We entered in opposition, and only in opposition, to that.

We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship, exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions toward the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live amongst us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it toward all who are in fact loyal to their neighbors and to the Government in the hour of test. They are, most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

I come now to the last part of the message which the Senator from Arizona asked me to read. I read the former part of the message for the sake of the context:

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

Now, I say to the Senator from Arizona frankly that in the words I have just read there is a statement that we are going to fight for small nations; there is a statement that we are going to fight for liberty; but, taken in connection with what precedes it, I give it no other construction, and I gave it none other then, and the Senator ought not to give it and the Senate never gave it any other construction than that we were entering the war to vindicate our own rights, and, of course, to help smash the great autocratic machine that was devastating the world and threatening us along with the remainder of the world.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I do not think there can be very much use of spending time upon it. The whole message has been read and is here for construction; but, of course, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I will merely observe that the Senator has made, as I thought he would, a frank and manly statement, which does him credit, that the President's address does say in terms that we were going into the war to fight for democracy and for the rights of the smaller nations.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I do not think the message says that. I do not get that construction out of it at all. I say that the President indicated there that we expected——

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator let me read this?

Mr. REED. The trouble with the Senator from Arizona is that he wants to take one sentence alone. I say that the President uses this language:

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—

He has told us what that was—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

Those are the first words that I have ever read from President Wilson that indicate that he had in his mind any other object; that he then was taking the view that if we got into this thing we would lick Germany, and that we might go further than the whipping of Germany. You can get that out of those words taken alone, but taken in connection with the context I gave them at that time no such sinister meaning as is now put upon them.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. I gave them the construction, the country gave them the construction, that we were summoning to our aid all the nations of the world; we were going to fight against the great power which was menacing us; we were entering the war to protect our own rights; but I ask again, what difference does it make? Suppose the President at that time had outlined his league of nations. It would not have bound this country, and no Senator was required to get upon his feet and repudiate it. It was a time for silence, a time when we would throw no apple of discord into our councils; and when the Congress came to act the official declaration of the Congress was the yardstick by which to measure America's purpose in entering the war, and I am about to present that.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point, I could agree with all the Senators says; but I insist that the only point I have to make is that the last expression the President ever made by way of argument in public urging Congress to declare war was the last paragraph of his address.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. ASHURST. Wherein he said:

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

The argument may not have been listened to by any Senator; no Senator may have considered that part of the argument; it may not have been binding upon the vote or the voice of any Senator; the argument may have been rejected; but, nevertheless, I consider my point made when I assert that at least before we declared war the President made that argument. That is the only point I have ever made or tried to make.

Mr. REED. Very well; it is a very unimportant point whether he said that on the 2d day of February or whether he said it within 30 days——

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will yield, it is a very important point. The Senator's able speech is all directed along the theory that suddenly—I will not say clandestinely, but suddenly—the President shifted the scene and said, "We are now fighting for the rights of other people, and we are fighting for civilization"; and the Senator wishes, or, at least, as I gather his argument he has tried, to make out that the President asserted, or pretended to assert, that before we declared war we were fighting only for the rights of America, but that after we got in he suddenly said we were fighting for the rights of other people.

Mr. REED. Very well; it is a difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. My argument has been that the President adhered to the policy of neutrality; that he subsequently came to armed neutrality; and that finally, as the President said, the United States did not declare war, but declared that Germany had made war upon us, and that the doctrine that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy was a thing that did not exist at first. I have contended from the beginning that it appeared a short time after war was declared.

The Senator found a loose expression in one of the President's speeches 10 or 12 or 13 days earlier; but what difference does that make? What I have been trying to show is that we did have an adherence to the American policy, and we had it the very day when war was to be declared.

Now, I will read to the Senator a statement I have already referred to in which the President outlined his policy as late as April 13, 1916, which, in my opinion, was the correct policy for us to follow. He was speaking at the Jefferson Day banquet of the Common Council Club and said:

Gentlemen, are you ready for the test? God forbid that we should ever become directly or indirectly embroiled in quarrels not of our own choosing, and that do not affect what we feel responsible to defend; but if we should ever be drawn in, are you ready to go in only where the interests of America are coincident with the interests of mankind, and to draw out the moment the interest centers in America and is narrowed from the wide circle of humanity? Are you ready for the test?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator does not contend that that utterance was made in 1917?

Mr. REED. I said that it was delivered in 1916.

Now, I will tell you something that was said in 1917. It was said on the 12th day of May, in an address at the dedication of the Red Cross Building in Washington:

It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign Government. The military masters of Germany denied us the right to be neutral—the war was begun by the military masters of Germany, who proved to be also the masters of Austria-Hungary. These men have never regarded nations as peoples—men, women, and children of like blood and frame as themselves—for whom governments existed and in whom governments had their life. They have regarded them merely as serviceable organizations which they could by force or intrigue bend or corrupt to their own purpose.

That is how we got in.

Mr. President, what did Congress do? Now, I am coming to what binds this country; and when it did what I shall show it did do, it acted strictly in accordance with the recommendation of the President. He did not recommend that we should declare war, but that we should declare that war had been made upon us. Congress declared—

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

That was our declaration. It was the official act; it declared the purpose of our Government; and it is the only thing that binds us.

Later, in the same language, we declared a state of war to exist between ourselves and Austria-Hungary.

Thus, Mr. President, we are brought to this situation:

We entered this war to defend ourselves against attacks being made upon us, upon our commerce. We entered on the 6th day of April, 1917, by declaring that Germany had made war upon us; and on December 7, 1917, we, for the first time, made the same declaration with reference to Austria-Hungary. It was on January 8, 1918, that the President, in an address to Congress, set out his 14 points.

Let us inquire, now, who is bound by the 14 points? Clearly the President, but whom else? Whenever you admit that because the President stands up in Congress or sends a message to Congress declaring a certain thing to be his opinion, that thereby binds this Nation, you end the legislative authority in this Government: you terminate Congress. All he has to do is to send down a decree, and we would simply register it. The President makes no such contention. He never has made such a contention. He has, with tremendous force and marvelous skill, presented his views from time to time to the Congress, and frequently he has used the Congress as a forum through which he could address the world.

A notable instance of that is found in his address that he delivered here on woman suffrage. He walked into the Senate one day and proceeded to make a speech, I believe on September 30, 1918. He told the Congress that to pass the woman-suffrage resolution was vitally necessary to the winning of the war. Did that bind the Congress? Did that bind the country? Did that commit us to woman suffrage, or did it commit the world not to win the war because we did not pass the resolution?

At that time, sir, we had 2,500,000 American troops in France. Only 500,000 of them had been employed upon the battle line, and yet those 500,000, one-fifth only of our troops, had stiffened the British line until its retreat was stopped, had stiffened the French line until its retreat was stopped, had given them the force so that they had begun winning skirmish after skirmish and battle after battle, and had rolled the Germans back from the Marne. It had given courage to the entire body of the Allies. Then had come Chateau-Thierry, in which the German military wave broke upon the rock of American courage; then St. Mihiel and Belleau Wood. Bulgaria had thrown down her broken sword. Her army was surrendering by regiments; her cities were yielding to the Allies. The Crown Prince of Germany had unofficially asked for terms of armistice. The German was in full retreat. Every day was bringing its victory. We were within 40 days of the final surrender; yet the President told us that the adoption of the woman-suffrage resolution was vitally necessary to the winning of the war!

I did not rise in my place to repudiate that. Was I therefore bound to his conclusion? I think one Senator argued the question out with him, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. We did not pass the woman-suffrage resolution, and we did win the war. We had it already won.

What a monstrous doctrine it is to claim that every time the President speaks the world trembles and nature yields from the womb of fate the child that answers to his word! I have the utmost respect and kindest regard for the President. I differed from him on many important questions. I probably will differ many times in the future. The President of the United States is a human being, occupying a very exalted position, possessed of a great intellect and a high responsibility. But, sir, there are at least 10,000 men in the United States who are capable of making good Presidents of the United States, and each of those 10,000 men may solve the problem that may have puzzled the mind of the occupant of the White House, whoever he may be. Indeed, it is the common experience of men, however wise or learned they may be, to find that an old farmer sitting in front of his door in the eventide may have solved some problem of state that has puzzled their minds and confused their intellects. So the fact that the President expresses an opinion or Elihu Root expresses an opinion does not bind the Congress or settle the fate of this Nation or of the world.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have been listening to the Senator's remarks very attentively, and as the Senator is speaking at some length I would like to call his attention to an admirable editorial from a well-known English magazine speaking highly of the action of the Senate in this connection and bearing out the Senator's argument. It will not take long to read it, and I think perhaps it would help the argument, if the Senator would permit it to be read now.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to it, although I have not seen the article.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] tells me that the writer, L. J. Maxse, is a well-known and prominent writer of England. I hope the Senator will listen to this. It is an editorial by Mr. L. J. Maxse in the National Review, a leading magazine published in England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Considering that the league of nations would not have been so much as mentioned at the peace conference but for President Wilson, to whom it is a sort of "King Charles's head," to be brought into every discussion, Englishmen are entitled to resent the suggestion of American propagandists that the covenant is a Machiavellian British trap into which crafty John Bull has lured the guileless gentleman from Washington. The more we think of it, the more convinced we become that the league of nations must have originated in a Boche brain, because it is so admirably calculated to promote Boche interests; but its place in the peace terms is manifestly American handiwork, for which President Wilson is entitled to all the credit as to any detriment. To ascribe it to Gen. Smuts, Lord Robert Cecil, or any other British statesman is not "playing the game." They worked at the draft covenant to please the President and because they were told and believed that the American people had set their heart on a league of nations, the creation of which was alleged to be the main cause of their being in the war. Had Col. Roosevelt happened to represent the United States in Paris in place of President Wilson it would never have been heard of. We can not, therefore, consent to have this abortion fathered upon us, and it is unfair of the Republican opponents of Wilsonian policy to thus arouse prejudice at the expense of Great Britain. On the other hand, the British have every reason for gratitude toward the Republican Party for refusing to buy a pig in a poke and for insisting that this question be discussed. In this respect the Senate has done infinitely better than our House of Lords. The House of Representatives is setting a good example to the House of Commons. We can assure Americans that outside our front benches, whose occupants are, generally speaking, "back numbers," and pacifist circles, the league of nations has no visible following in these islands. It is impossible to mention it anywhere in public or in private without provoking a smile. It is a portentious piece of political humbug which would not survive one serious discussion. Therefore it is undiscussed at Westminister. Unfortunately for the league's prospects, the Republican Party in the United States not only insist on discussing it but are in a position to destroy it. At the outset Mr. Wilson elected to ignore the Senate when he went to Paris, and his journalists gave us to understand that the Senate was a negligible factor and that the President was, so to speak, "It." Kaiser Wilhelm's autocracy was a joke to that of "Kaiser Wilson," as he has been called by angry Americans. It is time the British press showed more discernment in discussing the politics of Washington and abandoned the delusion that every Anglo-American problem is solved by chanting "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." At this moment, to use an expressive Americanism, Diana cuts little enough ice abroad and still less at home.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on account of a lamentable occurrence that will be announced to the Senate in a few moments—the death of Senator MARTIN—I intend to conclude what I have to say on this branch of the case by asserting that unless it can be found in the language in the President's message asking for war, to which the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] called attention, and which I think he misconstrued, there is not to be discovered anything from the President, as far as I know, that in any way could be said to have indicated this broad desire to democratize the world, until we come to the announcement of his 14 points. Those 14 points were given to us on January 8, 1918, nearly one year after we entered the war. I would not be misunderstood as asserting positively the statement that I make, but I am not aware of any such declaration.

At this point, and for reasons that will be obvious in a moment, I yield the floor.

DEATH OF SENATOR THOMAS S. MARTIN.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it is with profound sorrow and regret that I announce the death of my colleague, Senator THOMAS S. MARTIN of Virginia. He died at 1.30 o'clock to-day at Charlottesville, Va. He met death with that calm composure and courage with which he faced all the problems that presented themselves to him in life.

In his death a strong, sturdy character of heroic proportions disappears from public life. For more than 24 years he served as one of the most influential and potential Members of this body. Few Senators possessed in so high a degree the esteem, affectionate friendship, and good will that Senator MARTIN possessed, irrespective of political divisions. All appreciated his courteous consideration, his manly character, his kindly heart and feelings.

As majority leader and as chairman of the Appropriations Committee during the late war he assumed burdens and responsibilities that far exceeded his strength. Despite repeated warnings of his physician, despite the urgent suggestions of friends, he remained at his post of duty in the perilous and troublous times, and his death was a sacrifice on the altar of public service and public duty.

In his death the Senate loses one of its most influential, esteemed, and worthy Senators, the country one of its wisest and most sagacious legislators, and Virginia her most distinguished citizen, her most highly esteemed son, and her most beloved Senator. At a more appropriate time I shall ask the Senate to set aside a day to pay tribute to his achievements and record as a Senator and to his worth as a man.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been in the Senate with Senator MARTIN for nearly a quarter of a century. This is not the time, for it will come later, to speak of his long and distinguished service as it deserves. He was a high-minded, honorable man, who devoted all his strength, all his abilities, I may say all his life, to his public duties, for he wore himself out in the service. At this moment I can only think of the personal loss which comes to me in the death of an old friend whom I so much valued, and I am sure that feeling is shared by everyone who had the honor and satisfaction of serving with Senator MARTIN in the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 229) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN, for more than 24 years a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MARTIN, to be held in Charlottesville, Va.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the committee under the second resolution Mr. SWANSON, Mr. LODGE, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. KNOX, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. NELSON, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WALSH of Montana, Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, November 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 12, 1919.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee that the great coal strike which threatened untold misery to our people is at an end, in obedience to the mandates of law and order; that the new spirit of Americanism will have its rightful place in the vexed questions between labor and capital; and we pray that justice and equity may find its way among all concerned.

We thank Thee that armistice day was celebrated throughout our country with appropriate ceremonies—a day which brought joy and happiness to millions and struck the death blow to autocracy and militarism, brought the Hun to his knees in supplication; that our brave soldiers, led by their gallant officers, turned defeat to victory and received the encomiums of the liberty-loving people of all the world; that the living soldier is home among his friends and loved ones, that his dead comrade lives in the hearts of a grateful people, that the wounded and maimed will be cared for by a generous Republic, that the widow and orphan will be succored and comforted by a loving people; that democracy, liberty, truth, justice, and righteousness are the jewels which crown the victor with a diadem of imperishable glory.

"Hail with songs that glorious era,
When the sword shall gather rust;
And the helmet, lance and falchion
Sleep at last in silent dust."

And songs of praise we will ever give to Thee. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, and pending that I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill and the report to the extent of 2,000 copies each, the supply being entirely exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that 2,000 copies of the bill H. R. 10453 and report be reprinted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the morning newspapers have brought the information that four veterans of the great World War were shot down in cold blood at Centralia, Wash., in the district which I have the honor to represent, while marching in a parade to celebrate armistice day. They are the victims of a long premeditated conspiracy to bring about an armed revolution in the United States. I have sent the following telegram to the mayor of Centralia:

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
November 12, 1919.

Mayor ROGERS,
Centralia, Wash.:

Kindly express to relatives and friends of those young men who were assassinated in Centralia on armistice day by the enemies of the United States Government my profound sympathy. History will record these heroes as among the first to fall in an attempt at armed revolution against the United States, and for which every man who has been preaching syndicalism, communism, and class hatred is responsible.

[Applause.]

This is the attempt at revolution with bullets and rifles that these enemies of law and order have been calling for these years past. We of the Pacific Northwest have long seen it coming. We have been patient, have avoided bloodshed under every provocation, only to see these young men murdered in the streets of Centralia.

Their death will arouse the loyal people of the United States as nothing else could have done. This country must be purged of its seditionists and revolutionists to the last one, and if this means war, then the quicker war is declared on them the better.

ALBERT JOHNSON.

[Applause.]

These soldiers, marching on armistice day, were shot down from the windows and roofs of the I. W. W. headquarters in the city of Centralia. They were murdered for the purpose of bringing on class hatred. For a dozen years, Mr. Chairman, we of the Pacific Northwest have seen this thing coming. We have been patient in the extreme. We have avoided bloodshed. We have known just what Victor Berger and men of his stripe have meant when they have preached revolution to be fought with bullets and not with ballots, and when they have urged workers to have rifles and ammunition in their homes. Out in the third congressional district of Washington we have avoided bloodshed and summary action against these enemies of the Government. We have endured much—destruction of property, practice of sabotage, burning of buildings, and interference generally—but when our soldier sons are singled out and shot down from ambush during a patriotic parade and celebration of the ending of the World War, while bands are playing and flags flying, we have come to the limit. Every man who preaches sedition, advocates or practices revolution, must be run down and given summary punishment. If our laws are not sufficient, they must be made so. Every alien agitator who is here working might and main for the overthrow of this Government must be sent out of the country. There is no time for further delay. I have received the following telegram:

HOQUIAM, WASH.,
November 11, 1919.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Wanton and deliberate murder of four comrades of the American Legion by lawless I. W. W.'s occurred at Centralia to-day. We demand immediate and final action by Congress in curbing all enemies of our country and flag. A vascillating program can no longer be tolerated in dealing with the murderers of our comrades. Hoquiam Post, No. 16, American Legion, requests that you do your utmost to hasten through needed deportation and citizenship legislation. In this connection we pledge our support.

(Signed) HOQUIAM POST, No. 16.

That telegram reflects the spirit of all soldiers and sailors and all law-abiding citizens throughout my district and throughout the United States. The time for a clean-up is here. For years these plotters and schemers have been at work, and now they are breaking out in open defiance of law here, there, and everywhere.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In the face of all this, why are we now sidestepping on this railroad bill? Why do we not stand up and write a provision into the bill that will prevent the recurrence of such happenings in our country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am glad to answer the gentleman. Let all understand that revolutionists, socialists, syndicalists, dynamiters, bomb throwers, I. W. W.'s, and all of such classes have been for 20 years engaged in a persistent and determined effort to break down honestly organized, contract-keeping labor. The I. W. W. and honest federated labor can not live in the same community. Should the former break down the latter, it will be a sorry day in the United States. I have seen these traitors "boring in" for years. I have warned the people over and over again. I have warned the labor unions. I have seen the spread of I. W. W.'ism, and know how destructive it is to everything that the people of the United States hold dear. My contention has been that that branch of labor which is organized and orderly should be sustained and encouraged, for sooner or later we must all stand together against the element which demands mob rule, chaos, and destruction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. The time has come to deal with those who are determined to have revolution, and, my friends, I beg to assure you that the great bulk of laboring men in the United States are with us and against any form of disorder, anarchy, Bolshevism, soviet, or any kind of a government other than that of the United States under its Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. The time is all allotted.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I should not have taken any time in general debate if it had not been for the fact that some of my friends in the House were partial enough to me to say they would like to know what I thought about the bill in general and in some particulars. That I shall undertake to state, and, contrary to my usual course, I hope that I may say what I have to say without interruption. This bill, as has been so well stated on the floor of the House by the chairman of the committee and by those who have followed him, had the longest and most painstaking consideration by the members of the full committee in the hearing, by the subcommittee in this work, and by the full committee. No piece of legislation, where there are 21 members on a committee, is entirely satisfactory to every member of that committee. It could not be in the nature of things. This bill is not in every particular what even the chairman of the committee, who so ably presented it yesterday, desires or desired that it should be. I take it that in our compromises not only in the subcommittee but in the full committee we were all to some extent disappointed in what went into the bill. For the simple reason I object to some provision in the bill is no reason why we should make a tirade against the whole bill. If I object to some minor provisions of a bill I shall take potluck with my colleagues and try to correct that, as long as the bill is in the jurisdiction of the body of which I am a Member. As far as this bill in its general tenor goes, as far as it being an improvement upon the present system of the regulation and control of interstate commerce, I will say that it meets with my entire approval, and the bill in general, I think, is one of the greatest and most constructive ever presented to the Congress of the United States. It may be the gentlemen who are interested in water transportation find some things to criticize in this bill. The subcommittee was criticized because it put water transportation under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, thinking that we would iron out that difference and that we would be able to satisfy those who were interested in water transportation, so we struck all of that out of the bill, and my opinion at that time was that those who advocated transportation by water and represent that interest were well pleased with the bill, yet I find my friend from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], a member of the committee, on account of that and a few minor provisions, thought if this bill, containing 84 pages, is the best that this committee can give birth to, then Government ownership is the solution.

I do not agree with the provision in the bill for a statutory rule of rate making. I am against guaranties to railroads, and that is one of the reasons why I am so intensely and unalterably opposed to Government ownership of railroads. It seems to me that it is fundamental that when you rob the railroads of this country of the incentive of competition and service, you have taken away from the railroads the greatest incentive to perform a great public service to the people.

A statutory rule of rate making, it seems to me, is the next thing to a guaranty, and is the very kind of a guaranty we should not have. When we start out to name the things that should go in and be considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission in arriving at what they will consider in setting a just and reasonable rate, we are likely to leave out some things that ought to go in, and we are likely to put in some things that ought to stay out. We have had the question of the reasonableness and fairness of rates passed upon by many courts of this land. It is my opinion that now, if we in this bill establish a statutory rule of rate making and say what the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration in setting a rate, we are laying ourselves liable for every rate adjustment that comes out of the Interstate Commerce Commission to tread the long and weary path from court to court to the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause.] And I say that in this I am not criticizing the subcommittee that drew this bill, for the simple reason that every member of the subcommittee unanimously opposed the statutory rule of rate making placed in this bill. I believe that the House can do nothing better, when it comes to consider this proposition, than to strike that provision from this law.

Another feature that is contained in this bill, put in in the full committee over the protest of the subcommittee, is the settlement that shall be made between the railroads and the Government. It is my opinion that the rule laid down by the subcommittee, that had the indorsement of the Railroad Administration and those in charge there who were going to have to make the settlement of the railroads in the future, is a provision that should have remained in this law, and that the provision placed in it by this full committee should be stricken from the bill.

I believe, my friends, that the labor provision in this bill, on the theory that the subcommittee acted and upon the theory that the full committee acted——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I can not yield. I do not have the time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. For just one question?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I can not yield. If I yield to the gentleman, I must yield to others.

That theory on which they wrote it is as good as could be had. I am firmly of the opinion, though, that the country expects and is entitled to expect of this Congress a law that will go further than the provisions of the House bill with reference to strikes. After the bill was considered in the subcommittee and then in the full committee, and after many weary months of hearings before the committee, I must say my views upon this question were somewhat modified. I believe that in this hour of unrest and discontent, when it seems that the world is in turmoil, and we are trying to get back to normal conditions, it would be a mistake to pass a drastic strike provision which would take in and penalize every member of the railroad brotherhoods. And one of the reasons for that is that I believe it will be practically impossible of administration and execution. But I do believe that this House should go far enough to put out of business, if it can, the men whom I believe are not only the enemies of this country, but the worst enemies of organized labor. [Applause.] I refer to the walking delegate, who can never be satisfied at all, for the simple reason that if he is satisfied, and says he is satisfied, he is out of a job. The agitator is the one that I try to reach by an amendment that I presented to the full committee, and which I will present here. I believe that the boards constituted in this bill are as fair and as just as boards could be. I believe they should have the support of the people of the United States as a whole and not as a class. I believe that a tribunal is set up here where labor and capital and the public may be heard fully, and that a just and impartial decision may be rendered. I believe that prior to the submission of a labor dispute to the adjustment board, while it is pending before the adjustment board, while it is before the labor appeals board, when the men who labor are willing for the Government to handle their case, that any officer, agent, or representative of one of these unions who during that period of trying to adjust the differences between the laboring men and the railroads in any way conspires to bring about a strike and a tie-up of the commerce of this country should be subject not only to a heavy fine, but he should be placed, in the discretion of the court, behind prison bars. [Applause.] I shall, therefore, at the proper time offer this amendment:

Prior to submission of a dispute to the adjustment board, or during the pendency of a dispute before such board or before the board of labor appeals, it shall be unlawful for any officer, agent, or representative of any union which, or a member of which, is a party to the dispute to aid, abate, counsel, command, induce, procure, or consent to a strike, or in any manner to conspire to bring about a strike. Violation of this provision shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for a period of not less than 30 days or more than 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

It seems to me this course ought at least to protect the public and to protect the honest laboring man upon the railroads of this country from this agitator who goes around to disseminate his doctrines among peaceful, law-abiding, and satisfied men, in order to collect a fee and keep up his work. It seems to me that that provision is as mild a one as could be written, and certainly if this House and this Congress is not willing to adopt one of that character, then it is not willing to adopt any. I am frank to say that I would like to see a provision go further than that. I am trying to get results and not trying to appeal to the grand stand.

I am very happy to note also another provision in this bill, a provision in which the House of Representatives has been a pioneer, and, I might say, a provision in which my State of Texas has been a pioneer. That is a provision for the regulation of the issues of securities by common carriers. Many years ago my State passed a law that before any railroad company operating in that State should issue new securities for any purpose they must come before the proper regulating tribunal of the State, lay their case before it, and prove that they needed the money they applied for.

In 1910 a bill for the regulation of securities was before the Congress, offered by the present author of this bill and of the provision in this bill. In 1914 I had the honor of sponsoring a bill for the same purpose. That bill passed the House of Representatives by practically a unanimous vote. The bill at that time, as upon former occasions, died in the Senate. The bill that came from the Senate Committee during this session contains practically, word for word, the provisions of the bill that I sponsored in 1914 and which is incorporated in toto in this bill.

As was so well said by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ESCH], this provision of the bill will cause a house cleaning among the railroads of this country. If it had been in operation in the last 10 years, we would not have the disgraceful proceedings of a Rock Island, of a Pere Marquette, of a New Haven, and other railroads. The railroads of this country have stood before the country for the last 20 years and preached against the constituted authorities of this Government. They have announced it from the housetops that the Interstate Commerce Commission has destroyed the credit of the railroads; they have preached it from the housetops that the railroads have no credit. And then they complain, after making those admissions and those assertions, that when they go out into the market to borrow money they can not borrow money. Is there a business institution in this land that would stand for 30 days if it went out before the public and admitted that it was facing absolute bankruptcy? I know that the credit of the railroads of this country is bad.

I know that the public looks with suspicion upon the acts of railroads in general, and the reason for that is that the public heretofore has had the awful and the criminal example of these railroad wreckers who were able under the laws of the States through which they operated to issue spurious securities, based upon wind and water, and which when sold to a trusting public represented in their hands nothing but a hope, but that was a vanishing hope.

Of course the credit of the railroads has been destroyed. But if we write into the law of the land a statute to the effect that before a railroad can issue new securities, before it can put them on the market, it must come before the properly constituted governmental agency, lay the full facts of its financial situation before that body, tell that body what it intends to do with the money derived from the sale of the issue of securities, and after it has received the approval of that regulating body and it goes out and puts those securities on the market, then the Interstate Commerce Commission by this law is empowered at any time to call it to account and have it tell to that regulating body that it expended the money, the proceeds of the sale of securities, for the purposes for which it had made the application. Then we shall have railroad securities that will stand for value in the markets of this country and in the markets of all the world. That is what they should stand for—railroad security based upon value, and not upon wind and water; not upon a criminal hope of some man to wring from the public unjustly that which he should not have, but security that will create confidence in the mind of the investing public that it represents value and represents a hope of some man that there will be an honest return upon that investment in the future.

The railroad problem is a great one. We do not hope to settle it with this bill. It will not be settled this year. It will not be settled next year. But I do not despair on that account at all. This Government was at one time a small Government. No great enterprises were in it. No great railroads spanned this continent. It was easy to conduct the Government then. You could operate the Government with few laws at that time. But with our expanding population, with our expanding wealth, the Congress of the United States may not hope to settle any question at any time for all the future.

I do not despair because we can not settle this question in a day and therefore say that we must go off after the wild vagaries of the disordered mind of some theorist. I do not think that because criminals have been in the railroad business, because men have mismanaged this property, we should plunge this Nation into the chasm of socialism by taking over the railroads to be owned and operated by the Government. [Applause.] That would do more to unsettle the question than any other issue that has ever vexed this country. It would do more to place the question in politics than anything else that could be done.

You can see how that could be so when we add 3,000,000 men to the civil pay roll of this Government, when their political influence and political force would be exerted in every presidential and every congressional campaign; when each party, as it has too much done in the past, would go around electioneering, trying to trade with one special interest and another in order to get the votes. And when I say "special interests" I do not mean the moneyed interests, I do not mean the railroad interests, I do not mean any one interest alone; I mean any special interest, be it capital or be it labor, that hangs around the legislative halls of this Congress and of every State in this Union asking, and too often getting, special favors. [Applause.]

I hope when this law is passed it will in some degree take this question out of politics. I had also hoped that the labor question would be solved in a way that would take it out of politics to a degree. But I am convinced, I am sorry to say, that the labor question is almost beyond solution; that it will always be with us to fret us; that it will never be settled finally. But it is the duty of this Congress, representing the great people of this land fearlessly and conscientiously and justly, to the best of its ability, to solve it as best it can in the light of present conditions. It is to be hoped that the fullest and freest debate will be given upon all of the provisions of this bill. The committee, I am sure, has no false pride of authorship in this legislation. Every one is anxious that this bill shall be improved if the brain of this Congress is able to improve it.

This, in my opinion, is the best bill upon the railroad question as a whole ever presented to this Congress, and one of the reasons why I indorse it and am happy to vote for it is that it does not seek to uproot all that we have done in the past, it does not seek to overturn and to wipe out every statute that we have had in the past and every landmark that we have set up in the past, but it takes the broad foundations of the general act to regulate commerce and builds upon that what we believe is a structure that will be beneficial to all the people of this land. You may hope to get out of the conference a better bill than is presented here. If the people of the other body and of the country would listen to the many and unanswerable, it seems to me, objections to the bill presented in the other body, outlined by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] yesterday, it would be an easy matter to lay aside many of the things that are contained in that bill. But men do not look at these questions the same. They view matters from different angles.

Still I hope that when this bill shall come out of this House it will be even a better bill than it is now. But if it is not improved and remains as it is, even with some of the objectionable features, to my mind, which I have called attention to, I shall cheerfully support it as being much better than what we have at the present time, and it is a bill that will not plunge the railroad question deeper into politics, as a transportation board would, as a separate body to fix rates and wages would, or as a secretary of transportation placed in the Cabinet would, to be changed every four years at the whim of any political party. This bill is so much better than many of us hoped to get that I say to my friends in this House that I trust they will look upon its main features at least with sympathy, and I hope with approbation. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as a member of the committee I want to express, for myself at least, appreciation of the hearty approval and response with which the bill has been received by the Members of the House, as far as we have been able to discover from expressions by the Members.

I do not see how any measure could have received more careful and conscientious and industrious consideration by any committee of Congress. As explained by the chairman [Mr. ESCH], we began hearings on this bill early in July, and all during the rest of the summer and this fall, up to the day it was brought into the House, the committee have sat mornings and afternoons; all during the long, hot days of summer, when some of us wanted to go home, or when we wanted to be on the floor of the House or answer roll calls, we could not do so, because we had to stay and hear those who were testifying upon this bill. So the members of the committee neglected their personal interests, and their desire to participate in the discussions on the floor of the House, and even to vote upon bills that were before the House, in order that we might conclude the hearings on this bill and report it in time for it to be enacted at this session of Congress.

The hearings on this bill, in my judgment, constitute the most valuable discussion of the principles of railroad economics that has ever been published, and it will pay any of the Members of the House to secure a copy of the hearings for your own libraries and for future reference. The colleges of the country are sending for them to be used in their studies, and all who are interested in railroad legislation ought to have them. All of the best railroad economists, men who have had the most valuable and longest experience in practical railroad operation, came before the committee and testified. So I do not see how there could possibly be a more complete and thorough presentation of the various phases of railroad economics than will be found in the hearings on this bill.

I had expected, gentlemen, to have at least an hour in which to present what I wanted to say about this bill, but now I find through later developments that I have only 15 minutes. Therefore I am not going to attempt to present my views upon the bill. I can not do so in that short time; so I am going to eliminate practically all I had intended to say to the committee and confine myself to a few brief references to the proposed amendment that is going to be offered on that section with reference to the refunding of the railroad debt. I believe something ought to be said upon that question.

There was adopted in the committee an amendment to the bill that was reported by the subcommittee, and I believe it has been referred to here as the Merritt amendment. It has reference to the refunding of the debt which the railroads of the country owe to the Government. As I understand it, this amendment will be offered on the floor, and if adopted it will put the bill back into the condition in which it was reported by the subcommittee.

The difference between the two propositions presents a question that is to the laymen almost insoluble. It is a question of intricate railroad financiering. I do not know whether I could explain it to you satisfactorily or not. I am not going to attempt to do so, because I can not do it in the time I have. I can only show you the difference in the results of the two propositions. If I can make that clear to you, I will be satisfied, and then the Members of the House can determine which proposition they want to approve.

In presenting this important question I will endeavor to give you briefly the results of two years of Government operation of the railroads. I know that the Members of Congress and the country are interested in knowing concretely what are the results of this experiment in Government operation, which is generally conceded to have been a war necessity.

During the time of Government operation the Government has made a great amount of expenditures for what are known as additions and betterments to the railroads of the country. Those expenditures are ordinarily made by the railroads by the issuance of securities, so-called capital expenditures, as distinguished from current expenses. For instance, when a railroad replaces an old bridge with a new steel or concrete bridge, the additional expense over and above the cost of the original structure is charged to capital expenditure. In the same way, when they build a new station or any other expensive improvement of that kind, that part of the expenditures over and above the cost of the old structure is charged to capital expenditures, and they do not ordinarily pay that out of current revenues, but by an issue of new securities. It is a capital expenditure.

Now, the total expenditures made by the Government during this period of two years for betterments and improvements on all the railroads amount to the tremendous sum of $1,147,551,000. That amount has to be paid back by the railroads in some way.

There is $372,000,000 of that amount that has been paid out for new equipment, cars and locomotives by the thousands and thousands that the Railroad Administration has bought and allocated to the different railroads. That $372,000,000 they have arranged to pay for by the organization through certain bankers of the country of what is called a national equipment trust, which is going to take over the financing of that amount, and pay to the Government $200,000,000 in cash and give to the Government their securities for $172,000,000, or the balance. That is going to be done by this national equipment trust plan, provided Congress passes the necessary enabling act, which has already been passed by the Senate, and is now pending before the House, and ought to be passed before we adjourn.

If the enabling act for this national equipment trust plan is passed and becomes a law, the Government will finance the $372,000,000 which has been expended for cars and locomotives. This will be done by the acceptance of $200,000,000 in cash from the equipment trust and $172,000,000 in approved securities. That amount subtracted from the $1,147,551,000 which the Government has expended for betterments and improvements will leave $775,551,000 of so-called capital expenditures that will have to be funded when the railroads are turned back to their owners.

If the amendment to the bill which will be offered either by myself or some other member of the committee is approved and made a part of the bill, there will be deducted from that amount whatever the Government owes the railroads on their standard return, less certain exemptions, the sum of $415,016,000, leaving the balance of $360,535,000 that will have to be funded by the railroads by giving to the Government their secured notes. According to the plan embodied in the proposed amendment these notes will be payable in 10 annual installments, beginning five years after the return of the railroads and ending 15 years thereafter.

Under this plan there will also be due the Government from all of the railroads on open accounts, which will have to be evidenced by demand obligations, the sum of $105,646,000.

There will also be due the Government from certain railroads—namely, the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine—for money which the Government advanced on long-time loans to take care of obligations which matured about the time the Government took over the railroads, the additional sum of $68,375,000.

There will also be due the Government for certain additions and betterments to other properties and on open accounts which will have to be funded the sum of $53,000,000.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman state how the notes are to be secured?

Mr. DENISON. They are to be secured, according to the provisions of the bill, by first-mortgage liens, if they can be obtained; otherwise by the best security that the President can get.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In my State there are certain debts which are made first liens by statute, and therefore the roads in my State could not give a first mortgage.

Mr. DENISON. Under those circumstances the bill provides that the President must accept the best security that will be practicable.

In addition to the above amounts, which will be due the Government from the railroads for expenditures made by the Government, there is an additional amount of $14,342,000, which the Government has expended for equipment to be used on the inland waterways, purchasing and building boats, barges, and so forth, and which the Government will have to realize on as best it can by the sale of such equipment.

In addition to these amounts, which may be considered obligations of the railroads on which the Government hopes to realize full payment in time, the Government has sustained an actual loss in the operation of the railroads in the sum of $646,777,000. That amount represents the difference between what the Government has had to pay to the railroads for standard return, in excess of the amount which the Government has realized in actual earnings while it was operating the roads. In other words, the roads have earned $646,777,000 less than the amount which the Government has had to pay to the railroads in standard return, as provided for in the Federal control act. That at least is the actual loss to the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is there any hope of the Government being reimbursed for that amount?

Mr. DENISON. No; that amount must be charged off as the Government's first loss in the experiment of Government operation of the railroads.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is that estimate up to January 1 of next year?

Mr. DENISON. As accurately as could be estimated, up to January 1.

Mr. KELLER. What is the amount from July to the 1st of January?

Mr. DENISON. I can not give that to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. These figures are high; have they not been reduced during that time?

Mr. DENISON. I am giving the figures of the Railroad Administration itself, and I assume that they are not too high. I have assumed that the roads will be returned the 1st of January.

Now, if you add this $646,777,000, which the Government has actually lost in the operation of the railroads, to the other amounts which the Government has expended for the railroads and for which the Government will have to accept the obligations of the railroads, you will have the total sum of $1,421,026,000, which represents the amount that the Government will have invested in the railroads if the amendment that will be proposed is approved by the House and embodied in the bill.

You will remember, of course, that the Federal control act appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 as a revolving fund to be used in connection with the operation of the railroads. Since then Congress has made additional appropriations for this revolving fund of $750,000,000, making the total amount which Congress has appropriated for the Railroad Administration of $1,250,000,000.

Now, by subtracting this $1,250,000,000 which Congress has already appropriated from the $1,421,020,000 which is the amount that the Government has lost and expended for the railroads, you will have left the sum of $171,020,000, which will represent the deficit, as nearly as can now be estimated, for which Congress will have to make an appropriation in December if this bill is amended as I have mentioned.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Under the bill you provide for guaranteeing the roads the standard return for six additional months; how much is the Government going to lose by that?

Mr. DENISON. That I do not know.

On the other hand, if the amendment that will be offered to the refunding title of the bill is not approved, and if the bill is passed as reported to the House, the accounts will stand as follows:

As stated above, there has been expended by the Government $1,147,551,000 for betterments and improvements, of which, as I have stated, $372,000,000 will be provided for by the national equipment trust plan that I have already mentioned. This will leave $775,561,000 in capital expenditures which will have to be funded.

Under the present provision of the bill only a part of the amount due from the Government to the railroads on their standard return can be set off or deducted from this amount. Deducting the amount that can be set off, $133,911,000, from the $775,551,000 leaves $641,640,000, which the railroads will have to fund by giving to the Government their notes maturing annually, beginning five years after the return of the railroads and ending 15 years thereafter.

Under the present provision of the bill there will be due from the railroads to the Government on open account the sum of $16,876,000.

The other items of indebtedness I have mentioned above will, of course, be the same under both plans. Therefore, the total amount of both funded and demand indebtedness of the railroads—excluding the $372,000,000 of allocated equipment—will be $779,891,000 under the provision of the bill as reported, or will be $587,556,000 if the amendment that will be proposed is approved.

Accordingly, the total amount of money that will be required by the Government to complete the financing of the railroads under the plan proposed in the bill will be $1,613,355,000, as against $1,421,020,000 under the plan of proposed amendment.

Deducting the amount already appropriated—$1,250,000,000—from this first amount will leave $363,355,000, which will represent the deficit under the plan of the bill as reported, and for which an appropriation will have to be made by Congress during the coming December.

Stated briefly, the practical effect of the amendment that will be offered will be that the funded and demand indebtedness of the railroads to the Government will be $587,556,000, as against $777,891,000 under the provision of the bill. And Congress will have to appropriate $171,020,000 more for the Railroad Administration as against $363,355,000 under the provision of the bill.

The expenditures of the Government have been so tremendous, and the Government has invested so much money in operating and financing the railroads, it seems to me that Congress should hesitate to approve legislation here that will necessitate this additional large appropriation simply in order that some of the wealthiest of the railroads may collect from the Government what the Government owes them when they themselves owe the Government for betterments and improvements and other advancements such a tremendous amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentlemen on the other side are to use the balance of their time in one speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has 26 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wisconsin 32 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman yielded back 1 minute and that made me 27 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate closes at precisely 12 o'clock, and the gentleman from Tennessee has used up one minute in deciding which gentlemen shall use the time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH], a member of the committee.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, much has been said—and especially by those who believe that this bill is a great achievement—about the prowess of America, about our wealth, about what we can and ought to do to sustain our transportation system. I sometimes wonder whether or not Members on the other side of the aisle do not see in the future a fundamental principle involved here. When I say that I say it not in a spirit of criticism but with the feeling that at this time in our history we ought to proceed with caution where fundamental principles are involved. When the Constitution was framed, Jefferson, whom they love to look to as the great leader in the history of their party, rushed back from Europe to prevent centralization of power being given in the Constitution.

And for many administrations there was a contest constantly between the two parties, one seeking to secure a more centralized power in the Government, and the other striving to keep from drifting toward it. This bill will vest in a governmental agency extreme power. It vests in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to adjust railroad rates, freight and passenger, almost arbitrarily and based upon a purely artificial basis.

I sometimes wonder whether or not upon our side of the House we Republicans who are so solicitous because you on the other side during an emergency expended billions, and might have been extravagant in the letting of war contracts, or in some of the shipbuilding yards, or in France, in the conduct of the war—I sometimes wonder whether or not in the days to come, in the campaigns in which our party must meet the other in the conflict of debate, we may not be accused of extravagance along a different line in this bill. The sum of $250,000,000 is authorized in this bill for new loans. We have taken over the railroads and we are about to turn them back. We propose to offset accounts, as between indebtedness for equipment and additions and extensions, amounts owing the Government, against amounts which the Government owes the railroad companies for the unpaid guaranteed standard returns. We propose for six months after Federal control ceases to pay a further guaranty based on a three-year test period. In addition, we then propose to make new loans to the railroads. The railroads at the time we took them over were practically bankrupt.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Not now. I prefer to proceed without interruption until I finish my statement, then I would be pleased to yield. They were bankrupt at that time and they are bankrupt now, and they probably will be for years to come. What I fear is that this bill will establish a wrong permanent policy, and I do not have in mind now whether they are entitled to a guaranty for six months or not, for I regard that as a trifling matter in principle, even though it may mean a lot of money, for it is temporary. But in the establishment of a permanent governmental policy, in the matter of the performance of a duty of Congress toward the people of the country, I feel deeply concerned. As I regard our duty at this time, it is that the Congress should insure to the country a proper transportation system. And when I say that I do not mean simply a proper railroad transportation system, but a transportation system of all facilities of transportation, whether it be rail, water, or motor. When I say that I believe it is the duty of Congress at this time to insure to the people, to the commercial business of the Nation, which from interstate commerce and from foreign commerce must make the incomes from which they pay taxes into the Treasury—the money which we will dispense in this bill for the upkeep of that same transportation system which enables them to transact the business out of which they make the taxable profit—when I say I believe that we should keep up and maintain and insure to the people of this country a transportation system, I am looking to the future.

Looking ahead 15 or 20 years—and certainly that ought not to be a long time for us to project our minds into the future if we desire to legislate and establish fixed principles in legislation—I would predict the following conditions: Some of the railroads will have been granted money time and again. The Government will have taken their bonds or the best securities it can get under the provisions of this and other future legislation. Finally, there will come a time, as there has repeatedly in Italy, when the individually owned railroads will be taken over and operated by the Government, just as purchasers at receivers' sales of railroads have done in the past. And notwithstanding we do not determine a Government policy, the Government will be forced to embark upon the system of Government-operated if not both Government owned and operated railways. And right here let me say that in preference to a system of fostering financial dependency, of granting practically a subsidy, through direct loaning or preferential rates, with the result of stifling water and motor transportation development, I would prefer Government ownership and Government operation. This bill will, in my opinion, launch us on the policy of sustaining an exclusive railway trunk-line transportation, which will demand a complete abandonment of any and all other facilities. It will result in a double undue burden on the people of our country through the maintenance of an artificial rate structure coupled with an increased tax burden to supply constantly increasing deficits to the favored system.

I can not subscribe to the establishment of a principle of special assistance and exclusive rights to be granted by the Government to one form of transportation in preference to all others. It is true that we have one-third of all the railway mileage in the world. Yes; but we had also at the commencement of the war in Europe some 60,000 more automobiles than all of the rest of the civilized world in its entirety. This wonderful industry, now going into the most intensified motor-truck development, and a proper and free development of our great inland waterways and coastwise shipping, ought to give to America the best and cheapest universal transportation service that it is possible to secure. Any other system is but the imposition of an undue burden which means wasted energy, tribute to selected private interests, and handicap in competing in the world's markets without corresponding benefit to the producer of the raw material or the worker in the industrial establishment.

The proponents of the bill answer, "But we have given water transportation and motor transportation a free hand." To that I say it was proposed and strenuously maintained that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given the power to regulate water transportation rates, and some even proposed that motor-truck transportation be regulated. The launching of the policy contained in this bill will mean the subjecting of all other forms of transportation to regulation whenever it appears that competition from other forms threatens railway transportation.

I object to providing for emergencies exactly as we did during the war and not looking ahead to the future in any respect. I regard it the duty of Congress to provide the best possible and the cheapest and the most universal transportation system that can be provided. I believe it is our duty to so adopt principles in our railway legislation that they may be safely followed by future Congresses, because the example of this bill, the creation of the relation of guardianship which exists in this bill, the paternal proposition involved in making new loans to the railroads, and fixing rates on the basis proposed, will invite those railroads to come back to Congress again and again for financial assistance as they go down into a condition of worse bankruptcy than exists now, or than existed before there was Government operation or during Government operation. I say that it is our duty to establish a permanent Government policy and not to follow a sentiment resultant from artificial and temporary conditions.

There is nothing in the present situation which points to any certain determination of a permanent future policy as to operation or ownership and operation of the railroads, whether by the companies or by the Government, except that the provisions of the pending bill will not solve the problem. If you will talk with any railroad employee—any engineer, fireman, conductor, brakeman, or yardmaster—you will find that railway management was in a state of abeyance so far as the requirements in the actual operation of trains was concerned during Government operation of roads. The spirit of officials in management during Government operation, as demonstrated in contact with the employees, approached the status of farce comedy during the Government's operation, and it is an open secret that the delicate hand of officialdom was little feared or little felt during such period. So that while deficits and constantly depreciated service causes sentiment to demand flying from one extreme to another I do not believe a return to any such system or policy as this bill contemplates is justified. I would not enter upon a policy of subsidy to trunk-line railroads. I would not embark upon discrimination against other forms of transportation. I would not tax the people of the United States to sustain an artificial rate system for trunk-line railroads, or railroads in general upon the basis of insuring "necessary operating revenues" or a "fair return," as provided in the bill, with the inevitable result that it means the embarking upon a policy which must stifle water and motor-truck transportation and the consequent denial of cheaper transportation and the sustaining of an artificial system of rate structure to give "a fair return" to the system which stifles our natural facilities. It is burning the candle at both ends. The American people ought not to be burdened with such a system. I do not think they will be burdened with it long, and my prediction is that in a very few years Congress will be compelled to reverse the policy which it is now about to adopt. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has 6 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin has 32 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I sat here yesterday forenoon and closely listened to the able and eloquent address delivered by Mr. ESCH on this bill.

Last night I talked with and listened to the representatives of over 2,000,000 railroad men who are affected by this bill, and every one of the representatives of the men were fearful of the provisions of this bill where it governed them; these men believed, and I am of the same opinion, that with the creation of such boards and the powers granted them by this bill the hands of labor are tied; that labor is shut off from further advancement, further progress; and that even a new contract or agreement would be a thing of the past. For the first time in history by legislation it is proposed to put a club in the hands of corporate interests to use over labor organizations to the extent that it can reach into the treasury of the organizations and seize their funds.

The bill provides for the welfare of the railroads; it proposes to finance them, to see that they are in position to successfully operate when returned to private ownership; it protects property rights but it destroys human rights. If the roads are to be returned to private ownership, then the least thing this Congress can do is to return the roads the same as they found them when they took them over, with free men in the service. It is an injustice, a crime, to shackle the railroad men, to fasten upon them restrictions, to violate the privileges and rights they have always had, and which they have never abused. It is a poor return for their loyal and patriotic service.

Another thing, with the great unrest existing it would be a greater wrong for this Congress to add to this unrest by creating a law that would only make worse the existing state of discontent. You can not destroy the rights of citizens of this country; you can not make slaves of freemen and expect the people to accept the condition without protest. Injustice breeds resentment.

Congress should exert every effort and energy to bring about a feeling of stability and security in the country—to restore confidence in the hearts of the people. This can never be accomplished by unjust, unwise legislation. The bill before us has been in the hands of the committee for 10 weeks, and yet yesterday morning I gleaned from the remarks made by Mr. ESCH that that part of the bill dealing with the formation of the board he was not quite sure himself about its features. This bill has only been in the hands of Congress a little over 24 hours; it consists of 86 pages, and I believe it is too important a piece of legislation, too far-reaching in its effects, to be railroaded through here at the closing days of this Congress. In the interest of the people it affects, and in order that every Member should have ample time to study the bill and familiarize himself with its features and their consequences, it is my conviction that the wisest, safest, and best thing to do is to place it on the calendar, and when Congress meets again in December take up the bill and strip it of the provisions that are unjust, harmful, and injurious to the railroad employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] is recognized for 32 minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINSLOW. And also that I may proceed without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may proceed without interruption. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PLATT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes," had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CALDER, and Mr. SHEPPARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1229. An act to amend an act approved August 22, 1914, entitled "An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States."

THE RAILROAD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my purpose is not to make any argument for or against any provision of this bill, but to explain the mental processes which controlled the subcommittee and the full committee in respect of the provisions which they have set forth in the bill.

I have been told by those of long experience that it is not quite in the line of House etiquette to speak too freely of what takes place in committee. In order, however, that everybody here may understand the situation, I wish to tell you that the full committee agreed unanimously that the best thing to do was to bring out the final conclusions of the majority of the committee in respect of this, that, and the other provision, but with the full understanding that each member was free to disagree in respect of any provision, and to make his views known on the floor without any prejudice as to his good faith in the matter and without any reservation.

The reason for that is simple enough. Everybody who worked on this bill learned very shortly that it was a tremendous undertaking, and the more we worked on it the more we realized that fact. We realized that there were a number of points, all important, on which men differed. The full committee was almost evenly divided on several important features of the bill. On one or two provisions we had a change of opinion, as expressed by vote of the committee, due to the fact that on one occasion there was one set of men present, and on another the personnel shifted just enough to carry the other way, but still always in good faith and in good feeling. When, therefore, I make an explanation to you of the measure it will be in no sense out of accord with the determination of the committee.

There are many headings which might be taken up, but it seems to me, after listening to the debate here for the greater part of two days, that there are two which I ought to speak of especially, and I am sure I will no do more than that in the time that is at my command.

We had weeks of hearings, long, interesting, and very complete. No man who had a right to be heard or who asked to be heard was shut off. The committee members were long-suffering. The temptation at the outset was to get through as soon as possible. The argument, however, was that we had better learn all we could, and we became convinced of that more and more as we went on, because it was very apparent to most of the members that the more they heard the more they realized they had much yet to learn. We finally got through the hearings, and the subcommittee was appointed to draft the bill.

That subcommittee, before undertaking to go into the bill, from a technical viewpoint, decided to determine what its purposes really were, and we concluded that we must tackle this job with the idea of doing the best we could for this country, from one corner to the other, and from every confine to every other confine; that we must be just to the Government of the United States; that we must be fair; yes, generous, with the railroads of this country. And on that platform we went at our business. At no time in the meetings of the subcommittee did the question of locality interest ever arise. Locality considerations were represented by people from outside, and influences of an entirely proper order brought to bear in the interest of locality, but the committee never wavered from the general trunk-line route of heading on to what would be a national railroad policy, and the establishment of a railroad institution for this country which would be best for all the country. Unfortunately, I think—and I will not dwell long on this now—we have had a little touch of local consideration in this debate; but later, under the five-minute rule, we can get after that. We have proposed that at no stage of the game should the tail wag the dog.

Now, in the consideration of the railroad interests, which, by the virtual elimination of water carriers, has come to be the important interests in the bill, although no more important for the well-being of the country than the water interests, we felt obliged not to consider particularly the well-being of the very prosperous railroad, nor to bear in mind as a primary consideration the well-being of all the most impoverished and most impossible railroads, but to try to work along in the interest of the average road, yielding a little of the time in favor of the poorer road, which by virtue of generosity on the part of the Government might be helped on its way and headed on toward business prosperity. When you bear in mind that there are 2,000 railroads, more or less, in this country, running all the way from the highly successful to two streaks of iron rust across the country, you will realize that general legislation is quite impossible which the owner of each and every road thinks is entirely fair to his road. We can not do it in this bill.

While I am not a prophet, as one of my colleagues on the committee is, as to what will happen in the future, it seems to me quite likely we can never legislate here in one bill for 2,000 roads with almost 2,000 different conditions. The best we can do, I think, is to strike an average along the line, by virtue of which the strong road will look out for itself, the road which can not get along will be cared for, and so along down to the standpoint where we will help every road that is entitled to help as we can see the means to do it.

The two particular points that I wish to speak of are the refunding proposition and the financial provision, and if I have an opportunity I would like to say a little on the labor question, but I would rather make the refunding proposition clearer, because I expect that will be more difficult for the Members to understand than the labor proposition.

I wish to set forth a comparison, without argument, of two plans which affect the financial interests as covered by this bill. The plan proposed by the subcommittee was based on the line of thought that, first of all, we must get the roads out of the hands of the Government, so far as Federal control is to be considered. In order to do it, they must square accounts or otherwise provide for them. In short, they must make an accounting. So, then, the first thing we said to ourselves was, "What is necessary to consider in the way of accounting to close the books and end the contract, so far as that part of it goes?" We realized that we must have a refunding of some sort, and we squarely made up our minds that that refund, caring for the debts, must be divided into two classes—one which you would call permanent funding; the other a funding of a floating nature, in the order of notes.

The next thing was, having turned the railroads loose, should we turn them loose without a home, without any care, without any help, but simply say "Go forth and do your best"? We concluded, on the whole, bearing in mind the interest of the great majority of the railroads approaching the average line of prosperity, that it was only fair to give them a guaranty. That provision was in the bill. Then, the next question was, "What will we do for those roads for working capital?" And that provision is in the bill and will be duly explained later.

Then came on the consideration of the provision of funds with which to extend and make their improvements, betterments, and so on, for the future. All those points were taken up. The bill was brought into the full committee, and there arose an entirely proper and reasonable difference of opinion as to the method of procedure in respect of the refunding. In every other way we were in accord, with no difference whatever, so that, so far as this House is concerned, in respect of the immediate discussion of the two plans, you can bear in mind that the refunding scheme proposed is the only one which is under discussion, so far as the committee knows.

The refunding proposition is divided into two parts—what you might call the more or less permanent funding, and then the funding which is evidenced by notes. The discussion comes between the two sides to the contention in respect of the permanent funding and the interest rate. I do not think it is worth while to take very much time now in respect of the interest rate. That will come out fully in the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

We are, then, brought down to the real difference between the two sides on this discussion. I shall not go into figures unless you call for them, with the single exception of the mention of one sum, because I am well aware that the figures and their size and variety as they exist in the accounting commission would simply dazzle the observer. It is difficult, at the headquarters of the Railway Administration, to get them to tell you the same exact story on two successive days. In fact, they can not do it, because the financial conditions are changing from day to day. The railroads owe the Government, we will say, $1,100,000,000. The provision is to take care of a part of that through a car trust. The Government will get its money there. That will all be explained. There is no difference of opinion in respect to that. That will be explained in debate under the five-minute rule. The Government is supposed to owe—and we will say it does owe—the railroad companies a certain amount. We approach this point.

Now mark this; it is the whole story: We agree as to the amount that these railroads owe the Government, subject to funding, as provided in the bill. We all agree that the Government owes the railroads. Now, the question is—and I will illustrate it in smaller figures, which some of us will be able to comprehend—the railroads owe the Government, say, $100. Those small amounts are strange words here in these days, but they are comprehensible, perhaps. The railroads owe the Government $100. The Government owes the railroads $25. Query: Shall we offset the $25 against the $100, and fund that under the subcommittee's plan, or shall we not? If we do not, how do we take care of the $25 that the Government owes the railroads? Under the bill as now presented the proposition is that the Government shall pay the $25, and give it to the railroads to do what they want with; that it shall not make an offset.

Now, the argument, as I understand, then falls on the question of the wisdom with respect of providing a working capital for the railroads. The subcommittee felt that the working capital would be provided through other means in the bill which I will explain. Those who held other views as represented by the bill now before the House said, "No; they can not get that working capital so conveniently, so easily, and so thoroughly as they ought to if there is an offset." The subcommittee felt that if the Government offset and funded the balance—if they allowed the railroads to finance their floating indebtedness, betterment account, and other accounts, which could not be charged to capital account; if they furnished the railroads an opportunity for a guaranty of six months and the chance to get advances from the very beginning if they indicated a desire for higher rates and the need of more money; if they provided a method for the railroads to borrow money needed for extensions in the future; and if they furnished them, as they have to-day under the contract now in existence under the Federal control act, with the money to take care of all debts outstanding for current expenses, the railroads would be well provided for as to a means for getting necessary working capital.

Now, the broad theory of the subcommittee was that our purpose is to get the Government's hands off the operation of these railroads. But that is not all. Our purpose is to make these railroads go out in the world and be real railroads and hustle like other people hustle who do business. We do not want to pamper the railroads, the dubious and doubtful roads which run into the hundreds so that they will lie down and not have any incentive to get out from under the Government. We feel that we have provided to the railroads the means of obtaining sufficient working capital on favorable terms, and they can start out free from current debts, a thing which has not happened to them before within the memory of man.

If the other plan as proposed in this bill is adopted, some of the roads might get easy money, which they did not need; some of them might get some that they needed very much; some might get less than they need. The only difference between the two plans is as to the method; whether you want to fund to the greatest extent or whether you wish the Government to keep a controlling hand on its loans and watch the railroads and be able to say to them at any time, "We do not like your ways; we want you to do business more wisely," and so forth.

I believe that everybody on the committee is of the mind that the railroads can be run under either system and that the Government will be virtually as secure under one system as under the other. The only question comes as to the pressing needs of the railroads and the extent of the generosity of the Government.

There is nothing more, perhaps, that I need to say about that subject now; but as the provisions of the bill are read and we consider them under the five-minute rule, I shall hope to take part in that debate on the different sections.

Now, the other subject that I want to talk about is the labor question. Intricate and troublesome as the financial proposition has been to everybody, both on the subcommittee and on the full committee, I am sure it has not tried the souls of the members as has this labor proposition. That was the subject entering into the discussion of every phase of the construction of this bill. We were never without it. Its shadow was over us from the beginning to the end. We referred to it from time to time, and finally got down to the point where we had to consider it specifically, and for four days and a half we worked on that labor problem, and I think every member was dreaming of it every night. We had all sorts of suggestions, all the wild-eyed schemes you could think of, every sort of ism and squism that you could imagine. [Laughter.]

They were all brought in before the committee. We had the suggestion of the man who would "eat 'em alive." We had the suggestion of the man who would not pay any attention to them at all, God bless them, and there we were. Everybody of that subcommittee had the feeling in his soul that if any operative of a railroad did anything nasty or mean or willful or disloyal or unpatriotic, to the extent of creating an interference with the public good, he ought to be handled in some way, and that if anybody willfully did anything that was reprehensible and rotten, he ought to be taken by the throat and squeezed back on his job. That is the inner heart of every man in this House, and it is the inner heart of every man outside. It is the inner heart of the inside of the labor organizations, if in any particular case a man's toes or the toes of his family are stepped on. [Applause.]

And so on down the line. It gets down to every man for himself. In this recent trouble in Boston nobody was so much down on those rotten policemen as the laboring man who had a brick go through his window and hit his wife in the face, or spill the soup on the kitchen stove. [Applause.] That is not guesswork. It was worked out. When we came to test it out in Massachusetts we had no politics in the campaign, and I do not bring it up on that point. It was a clear case of law and order against disloyalty and rowdyism. [Applause.]

What is the result? We know and can demonstrate, as well as you can demonstrate anything of the kind, that thousands and tens of thousands of members of labor organizations voted for the champion of law and order. I will not even call him by a party name, so as to keep politics out of this discussion. They voted that no set of fellows could endanger the well-being of the public. And, mind you, every man who belonged to a labor organization found that he was one of the public about the time these outrages were going on. [Applause.]

So we realize that everybody has it in for the man who is doing the wrong thing, if it can be established that it is wrong. Up there in Massachusetts we treated it by moral suasion, by having the State Guard march up and down the streets for drill, and they gave an imitation of what they would do if there was a mob, but the mob never came out for practice purposes. [Laughter.] So they finally got up to public opinion. And, mark you, I believe nothing of that kind will take place in Massachusetts for many a day, because they have learned there the lesson that this whole country ought to learn, and that is, that at the last call those who have long been asleep, the Rip Van Winkles of the time, will come to the front when law and order and common decency are at stake. [Applause.] We took courage in our committee from that fact. Just at the time when we were at the height of the consideration of this matter they had the unhappy outcome of the council to adjust labor matters here in Washington. We were in the midst of several turmoils and troubles.

As time is fleeting, I will boil it down. We analyzed the situation as well as we could, and there were some in that subcommittee who did not give up the idea of putting long, hard second molars into the bill—not milk teeth, but real molars that might be expected to stay for a while. But the more we tried to apply the principle of coercion by force, the more we tried to work out penalizing provisions, the more we realized that the task was difficult. Legal objections came up on this side, practical objections born of experience on the other. The great human element that must be considered in this matter above everything else, before we will ever work it out, all seemed to tend to the establishment of a conclusion that, no matter what we did about eating 'em alive, no matter what we did about shooting them at sight, first of all we must be righteous, we must be decent, and give every man in this country a chance in the beginning to discuss his troubles and settle them like men and gentlemen. [Applause.] So then we said, "We will go to work on that line, and if the teeth business has to come along and we have to make a set, we will do that after we have tried the peaceful and friendly proposition."

Now, when we got to the establishment of the friendly method which has been set up in this bill and which we can discuss in detail later, we all agreed that there was only one real weapon with which we could vanquish the foe, and that was the great public opinion of the country, and we framed that bill so that the contenders could rub their noses together at a different stage of the game, force them right into the pit, rat and pup, without regard to which is which, and let them go at it. If they can learn to live and eat out of the same saucer, well and good; they will find it out and it will be easier for them to do it the next time, and the generations to come will have no trouble about it. But the very minute it becomes a fight to the finish, we know the results, because we have been living in that atmosphere. So in the subcommittee we never got to the point of applying a penalty in the sense of having teeth in it, and when it came into the full committee the rest of them finally came to feel the same way.

Some Members felt that we ought to be firmer, that we ought to be stronger, and some of them, I fancy, will so express themselves on this floor; but the majority of them came to feel that after all the subcommittee were right, so we left the bill as it is. That is the reason for it. That is the argument. And I want to tell you, my friends, if any of your neighbors tell you that the committee, or you if you support the committee, are lacking in moral courage in not putting in a provision with teeth in it, you just tell them for me—and I have had more of it by a darned sight than I wish I had had—that it takes a great deal more courage to stand up and extend the right hand to a fellow you are against, and say, "Well, now, God bless you, let's see if we can't get together," than it does to square off and hit him if you think you are big enough to get away with it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I.—DEFINITIONS.

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "commerce act, 1919."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the account of this bill and of its passage through the House as it will probably be given will be a reminder of the renowned nursery rhyme which gives an account of the birth, life, and death of one "Solomon Grundy."

This bill was introduced on Saturday night after everybody had gone to bed. It became available to Members on Monday and was reported by the committee on the same day.

Taken up on Tuesday; debated on Wednesday; amended on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and probably finally passed on Monday.

"And that was the end of Solomon Grundy."

And the victim of this farcical haste is the long-suffering public—always despoiled, always neglected, always cheated and discriminated against.

I believe that in the history of Congress there has never been a measure of similar importance of which the membership of this House was given such a meager opportunity for consideration. If it were parliamentary and I felt that it would be good manners to do so, I would like to ask the Members of this House who are present now in the Chamber, how many have read this bill—have even so much as read it, not to speak of having studied it? Then, having brought out what I imagine would be not over half a dozen outside of the members of the committee which reported the bill, I would like to ask that half dozen if there be a man among them who has the boldness to say that he fairly understands all the terms and provisions of the bill?

Oh, of course the committee has held long hearings, but of what benefit are those hearings to other busy Members of the House, who have many other important matters to consider and to attend to? We have not read the hearings; no one has read them. The committee has given much consideration to provisions later incorporated into the bill, but of what benefit is that to those not on the committee, unless we are willing to accept the opinions of the committee without having any convictions of our own on the subject? There is a wide variance of opinion even among members of the committee. Many important provisions of the bill are favored by a bare majority of the committee only. I have my own responsibility in this matter. I must have some convictions of my own. I can not shift my burden to the shoulders of the committee. The fact is, gentlemen of the House, we are considering this bill without any adequate knowledge of its provisions being possessed by the body of the Members of the House.

The bill to me is impossible even with the little I know about it. It is impossible for a number of reasons pointed out by various members of the committee themselves. I can not under any circumstances support it for a dozen reasons, and I have no doubt there are dozens of other reasons hidden in the bill in the form of jokers, obscure provisions, and equivocal phrases and things that can not be readily understood which would forbid me from voting for it on final passage.

To me the bill is impossible, because of the method of accounting which is provided for between the railroads and the Government. There is such a discrimination against the people of the United States and in favor of the owners of the railroads in that manner of accounting that I can not support it or even find it tolerable. I will not agree that the Government shall not be permitted to set off against a railroad the debt which it owes the Government against what the Government owes it, and that the Government must wait 10 years for what the railroad owes it, yet must pay in cash what it may owe the railroad.

But more, the bill is intolerable to me as capitalizing and making good all the billions of dollars of water injected into the securities of the railroads of this country by dishonest speculators and promoters. It is proposed not merely by this bill to make this water good to the owners, but to tax the people of the United States—those who are now here and children yet unborn—to pay interest and remuneration to the roads on all the water injected into their stock.

The bill is impossible because it contains the unjust and intolerable guaranty of remunerative income and rates to the railroad.

It is intolerable because it lends the credit of the United States, your credit and mine, and that of our humble constituents far away in Alabama, in Illinois, in Montana, and throughout the country—it lends their credit to private enterprise. It enables private parties who are in the business of owning railroads for the money they can get out of it, to use the credit of all the people of the United States for their private gain. It grants a subsidy to the railroad owners in the most vicious form. I can not vote for the bill because of that.

Why, just let me say it all in a few words. We took over the railroads because their owners were unable to run them. They could not meet the emergency; they did not have the money nor the credit; they did not have the brains and character to run the roads under the stress of the circumstances of the war. We took over the railroads because the men who owned the railroads wanted us to do it as a favor to them. They could not run them. They would have been in bankruptcy long ago had we not taken them over. We took them over and spent the money of the people of the United States in rehabilitating them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have but little time, and——

Mr. MADDEN. We will get the gentleman more time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will get me more time, I will answer the gentleman in that time.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman state a few facts in his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I could not hope to get any help from the gentleman from Illinois along that line. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we took over the railroads, we have rehabilitated them, refurnished them, rebuilt them, and recquipped them out of the Treasury of the United States. We have paid their owners an extravagant compensation for their use. And now we are turning them back to the owners, and paying them to take them back, and lending them the credit of the United States. That is the situation. That is rank and vicious class legislation, legislation in behalf of a very small minority—the people who own the railroads of the country.

When the railroad employees brought out the Plumb bill, the reactionaries of the country hooted, and their newspaper organs called it "Bolshevism," because they said it was class legislation. Now, I ask, How can you discriminate between legislation for the benefit of employees and legislation for the benefit of the owners of the roads. The only difference, as far as I can see, is that in one case you legislate for the benefit of a great multitude of men who toil and in the other you legislate for the benefit of a few soft-handed gentry who sit in swivel chairs clipping coupons in the back rooms of the banks. What is the difference in principle, assuming that the charge that the Plumb plan is class legislation? If the Plumb plan is Bolshevism, then what is this that you are doing here to-day?

As bad as the bill is, I congratulate the committee for having done even as well as it has. God knows they were up against influences such as never confronted a committee of Congress in this country before when they undertook to hold even-handed the scale of justice between the people of this country and the vast domineering interests that own the railroads of this country. Oh, they did well. Think what they were up against. In the first place, here were a lot of men fighting to capitalize some eight billions of water. Here were a lot of men playing for a stake of $8,000,000,000, trying to validate fraudulent stock and guard it and make it safe for all time to come.

They have had their lobbyists in Washington for a year, the strongest and best financed lobby ever in Washington, for they were playing for the biggest stake. They have had the best brains that money could buy, the ablest lawyers that could be induced for a price to work against the public interest. They have collected astute representatives from every quarter of the country. They have used every art known to political and financial influence and of social prestige. The committee has been besieged from day to day by these representatives of selfish interests. They are not inexperienced men. They are men trained in the railroad school. The interests which have besieged the committee are the same interests which through all these weary years have corrupted the politics of the States and swayed courts, legislatures, and executives. They are old and seasoned in this work. They are apt in deception, in the framing of jokers in legislation, in the injection of phrases not easily understood.

The wonder, then, grows that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have been able to bring out a bill which in any measure protects the public interest. Again I congratulate the committee, for evidently they have withstood many of the influences brought to bear. I respect the judgment of the members of the committee. They are splendid gentlemen, but the fight was unequal. They were handicapped. It is too much for my credulity to believe that they have come as victors out of this conflict with these vast and invincible selfish interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more in which to answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking a question suggested by the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. The gentleman from Alabama objects to the consideration of this bill at this time on the ground that he does not understand it, and I think perhaps his remarks indicate that he does not understand it. He says that because he does not understand it, he will vote against it. I suggest that if every gentleman here took that ground we would never pass this or any other legislation. But I want to be quite certain as to the necessity, the pressing necessity, for action on this subject at this time. My understanding is that the President of the United States has declared that with or without legislation he proposes to return the railroads to their owners on the 1st of January. I should like to ask the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee what, in his opinion, would be the effect upon the railroads and the public if the railroads were returned, as the President indicates he intends to return them, on the 1st of January in the absence of legislation, and I yield to the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, on, say, the last day of December of this year it would put the railroads in the status they occupied on the 30th day of December, 1917, at which time they did not have the increase of 25 per cent in freight rates and 50 per cent in passenger rates. A return of the railroads at that time, without legislation, would put them back to the precontrol status in respect to revenues, and in the meantime the cost of labor would remain as it is to-day, because probably under no circumstances would the present wage scale go back to the precontrol status; hence receiverships would be likely to result.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And what would be the consequent effect upon the public of such a condition?

Mr. ESCH. You can not jeopardize the financial standing of the greatest industry in the United States, outside of agriculture, without jeopardizing the financial standing of all the industries. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. What the gentleman has said shows beyond question the pressing necessity for this legislation, and his answer justifies, in my opinion, its passage as speedily as possible.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I was not able to use the time allotted to me a short while ago in general debate, as just at that moment a constituent called me out of the Hall on important business. If I could, I would supplement the splendid speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] on this bill, as I thoroughly indorse some of his criticisms. Like him, I am in favor of such a bill in the main, but certain parts of it I would like to see changed.

If it were necessary to follow a text, I would take the one, applicable alike to the carriers and to the employees, in the admonition of one of the greatest expounders of the law in the history of mankind, which I want to read to you—something I do not often do—and I read from the third verse of the third chapter of First Timothy, wherein St. Paul says:

> Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous.

On the 15th day of July, 1913, this Congress foisted upon the general public——

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I would gladly yield, but I have only five minutes. If the gentleman will get me more time, I will yield.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. I was just going to ask the gentleman whether that Epistle from St. Paul was addressed to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It was addressed to every human being who walks the face of the earth from now until eternity. St. Paul never made an idle admonition. It was addressed to every man who lived then, who exists now, or who comes hereafter. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that on the 15th day of July, 1913, Congress foisted upon the general public one of the most farceful acts that has ever been kept from a movie screen, when it inaugurated what we call the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, which has been productive of nothing except expense to this Government, a tribunal without decision, a tribunal without the authority of making its decisions good. Show me a business man who has ever come in contact with the Board of Mediation and Concillation and I will show you a man that will tell you that it is a farce. He will tell you that every conciliator who has attempted to settle disputes of the various branches of industry has had but one purpose and has been influenced by but one desire, and that has been to make those branches of industry comply with the demands made upon them by organized labor. This board has been under the absolute influence and domination of the Secretary of Labor, who is an avowed advocate of unions. We are proposing now to have a second board of mediation and conciliation. One is not enough, because it is impotent, and we are asking for another one with stronger impotency, if there could be such a thing. How are these two boards provided for in this bill to be inaugurated and created? I will pass the adjustment board, because we know that it will mean nothing. We know that it will mean nothing to the people of this country, but let us get down to the proposed board of labor appeals. How is it to be created and how is it to be inaugurated? First, we have to have nine members on this board, each one of them to draw not the $7,500 salary of a United States Senator or a Representative in Congress. That is too small for him. He is to draw $2,500 more than a United States Senator or a Representative in Congress. We are to have nine members on this board, each drawing $10,000 a year, and how are they to be selected? Three representing the unions, three representing the carriers, and three representing the general public. So far so good, but it does not stop there. The wings are clipped with respect to one part of this triumvirate. The three representing the public are members in name only, having neither vote nor participation in any decision to be reached. Let me show you further. Every one of those three representatives of the carriers, before he can sit on that board and render a decision——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Every one of those representatives of the carriers before he can sit on that board and render a decision must cut loose from every bit of railroad stock that he may have owned theretofore.

He must cut loose from every position which he occupied connected with the carrier. If he owns railroad stock, he has got to sell and give it up before he can sit on the board; but the union man, the union man who represents the employees, all he gives up is just to separate himself from the union temporarily, and being separated he will not lose any of the old-time feeling that he had with regard to the union any more than the Secretary of Labor has lost his for the United Mine Workers of America, of which he was formerly a ruling officer. What about the decision? Is it to be rendered by these three interested parties—the carrier, the union men, and the public? Oh, no! The public representatives can sit and hear the testimony and talk in meeting, but they can not take part in, vote, or help render a decision. They have not any voice in the final outcome of the transaction. In other words, they just simply sit and draw their salaries. Can we expect any good to come out of such a tribunal as that? Even if they have the power of decision we could not expect anything. Why? Because yesterday morning we were advised that there was an all-night session in the city of Washington night before last to decide what? To decide not whether organizations would carry out the recommendations of a labor appeal board. No. But to decide whether or not organizations would obey the law of the land. If they will first arrogantly threaten not to obey the law of the land, as was done by President John L. Lewis, President Alexander Howat, and even by the so-called conservative Samuel Gompers, and then if they sit up all night to decide that one question—whether or not they will obey the law—how can we expect them to carry out the recommendations of a tribunal that has no power of mandatory decision, no power to impose a penalty, or to make their decision effective? Can we expect it when they have ignored and disobeyed the appeals of the President? I want to say it is just adding another expensive board of mediation and conciliation that will be meaningless to the people of this country, except to saddle upon them an immense additional burden of expense. Are you colleagues ready to sidestep again? Are you ready to evade this issue again? Are you ready to shunt it over to the other side of the Capitol again, like it has been shunted back and forth for years past until the present time? This issue must be faced and finally decided some time. Why not now? I want to say to you that the people of this country are expecting you to see to it that there is a proper wage-dispute tribunal established in this country that shall do justice to every man—do justice to the employers, do justice to the employees, and, above all, to do justice to the 110,000,000 people of the country of the United States whose interests have been so vitally affected. Shall we wait until every railroad in the land is tied up before we act? I want to say that I am not going to shirk my duty. I am going to stand up here and vote to carry out the suggestion made by that splendid young Congressman [Mr. WEBSTER], who made a magnificent speech here on this subject last night. I want to say that so far as they go I am in favor of the suggestions made by my colleague [Mr. RAYBURN], but they do not go far enough. We ought to face and properly decide this momentous issue now and for all time while we have this opportunity. Do you know how expensive it is? Let me show you what this ineffectual compromise measure is to cost the people. There are not only nine men drawing $10,000 a year, but, on page 37, it is provided that each one of these boards is to appoint a secretary at $5,000 a year, to be paid by the people. Each one of them is to have the power of appointing and removal of such officers, employees, and agents, and to make such expenditures for rent, printing, and telegrams, telephones, law books——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have one minute more?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, let him have five minutes more. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sincerely glad that the House has so unanimously applauded the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who has just entered the Hall, and who will shortly leave us for other honorable duty. I am always willing to suspend and take a back seat in the presence of any man who wore the uniform of our country. [Applause.] I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania for acquiescing in extending my time and also thank my other colleagues. Now, what else does this bill provide? That these boards each shall have the power not only to appoint all of these employees whose names I have read, but they shall have the power to fix their salaries, assuming another function of Congress, if you please, in that respect. What else do they expend? They are authorized to make expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephones, and law books. What do they want with more law books? Why, every time we provide for any kind of a board we have to give them law books. God knows that probably they never look into one—law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and other supplies and expenses not itemized, including these salaries, and providing they can fix the salaries. I am not ready to give up all the functions of Congress with respect to fixing the salaries of employees of this Government. I want to say that we ought to amend this bill. If we are going to do something for merited relief of the people of this country, if we are going to provide such a board, we ought to so arrange this law that it shall be absolutely fair and square to every single person interested, the employers, the employees, and the public, and when it decides the question, let this board have the power to make that decision good and to force the controversial parties to abide by it, and then the interests of the people of this country will be protected. Why, you take the biggest multimillionaire Member of this House and let him have a financial difference with the biggest multimillionaire Member of the Senate at the other side of the Capitol involving millions of dollars. Can they settle that difference under the laws of this country in a way that will menace the safety of every individual in this land? No. The law compels them to go into the courthouse and submit their differences to a jury and a court, and when that verdict is rendered, no matter how unfair it appears to any one of them, they have got to obey the law of the land. [Applause.] I want to say that we ought to provide a sure-enough labor appeal tribunal. We ought to establish this tribunal and clothe it with proper functions and powers in a way that it will mean something to the parties to the controversy and also to the people of this country. Let us adopt the amendment that is to be offered by the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] and let us put teeth in it. Let it mean something both to the carriers and the employees. One thing further. They say, "Oh, but we are going to enforce the contracts which the railroads and the brotherhoods may make with each other." The railroad's contracts do not have to be enforced. If they violate their contract, the employees injured go into court, sue, and recover a big judgment and take, if necessary, every bit of property they have in satisfaction of the judgment, but when in this bill the committee has sought to provide for the satisfaction of a judgment against any of these organizations, they exempt every bit of property such organizations usually own, hence how can the judgment be satisfied? What would the judgment be worth against them? There is nothing whatever in this bill to force the brotherhoods to do anything more than they are compelled to do now under present law. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent railroad strikes. After this proposed law is passed, and we expend hundreds of thousands of dollars more of the people's money, railroad employees will still be able to strike and absolutely tie up every railroad in the United States.

Why, practically the only property that such an organization has is the benefit funds that are paid in by all the members. When you exempt those benefit funds you absolutely fix it where, if you had the biggest judgment in the world against any of the brotherhood organizations, you could not collect a cent. If you are going to have a law that is fair and square to the employee, why not have one that is fair and square to the carrier? I never represented a corporation in my whole life. I have always been on the other side of the question in the courthouse, and in several hundred cases have represented citizens suing railroads. I have never ridden on a railroad pass in my whole life, and I never expect to. I have never owned one dollar's worth of stock in a corporation. My sympathies have always been with the man who labors. But the general public must be protected by the assurance of law and order at all times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take issue with the one assertion of fact made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], namely, that this bill recognizes and would pay dividends upon $8,000,000,000 of watered stock—wind and water, I think he said, to use his exact words.

I got this bill last Sunday. I have made, I think, a careful study of its provisions, sufficient so that I can assert that there is not a line or a syllable in it that could by any means be tortured into a recognition of any requirement to pay dividends or interest upon watered stock or inflated values. The only provision there is in the bill to regulate these matters provides for the payment of rates that are just and fair, and provides also what may be taken into consideration in estimating those rates. The items that are set forth are those that are absolutely necessary in determining what would be just and fair.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion heretofore to examine and study at some length the matter of watered stocks and fictitious securities. It fell to me to institute the investigation against the Rock Island Railway Co. and, in a humble way, to assist its being carried out by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That investigation showed that the Rock Island Railway had been robbed of millions of dollars, but that robbery did not cost the public at large one cent. The consequences of it, as well as the results of robbery of such railroads as the New Haven, the Frisco, and others, fell upon the unfortunate stockholders and bondholders who had invested their hard-earned money in the securities of those railways. Those were the people who had to make up the difference or suffer the loss. In the case of the Rock Island, a heavy cash assessment was levied upon the stockholders in order that the railroad might go on with its proper functions. In other cases, such as have been mentioned in debate by the distinguished chairman of the committee presenting the bill, the stockholders, instead of receiving dividends, have gone for years without a penny of return. Whether they will ever see any returns upon their money is another question. But this bill makes no provision for the payment of anything more than a fair and just rate for the services which are to be rendered by the railroads.

Now, where the gentleman from Alabama got his idea that watered stock was to be recognized by this bill, I can not imagine.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will yield, I will tell him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman had 15 minutes, and failed to tell us where he got that idea. I have much less time, and must leave him to state it hereafter, if he can.

The credit of the railroads is gone. We all admit that. We may disagree as to why it has gone. I think myself that the railroad officials are largely responsible for its disappearance, because they have been for years claiming that a sufficient rate was not authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to have them keep the roads in proper condition, notwithstanding the fact, as stated by the distinguished chairman of this committee, that the last three years before the Government took over the railroads were the three most prosperous years they ever had in succession. Moreover, the cases of the railroads which have been looted have made the public suspicious of all railroad securities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I want to finish this line of remarks.

As a consequence of the propaganda that has been carried on, I think, by the railroad officials the credit of the railroads has disappeared, and if we pass them forth now, turn them loose, without giving them any assistance from the Government, there can be but one result—they will simply fail to give the public the service necessary, because they do not have a credit and standing which will enable them to obtain funds for proper operation.

I know of no more dangerous proceeding than it would be to simply cast the railroads loose, without making any provision for their credit, for means to obtain additional cars and equipment, to provide for the maintenance of their way—in short, for means to carry on the business of this country, for which they have at this time, as everyone concedes, insufficient resources at their command. That would invite a disaster such as was never known before in the business history of this country if we should undertake it. On the other hand, we are in no danger of loss by extending credit to the railroads. All of them have property in large amounts. It is easy to make these loans that may be made to them first liens upon some of their property or other revenues and make them secure. I see no occasion for the Government ever losing a dollar on the extension of these loans, unless it be in some isolated case where the road was bankrupt when taken over and can not be operated at a profit. The rate of interest provided for in this bill, it seems to me, is a rather high one, but this will insure payment as early as possible. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the provisions in the bill in this respect ought to be approved. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I rise particularly, gentlemen, to express for myself as one of the committee, and I think perhaps for the other members of the committee, a regret that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] made the remarks here that he did a few moments ago. Whether they were intended to do so or not, of course, I am not going to say, but they might have the effect of discrediting the work of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of discrediting the bill not only here but before the country.

Now, I shall be glad to have every Member point out any specific objections that they may have to the bill and offer any amendments they may wish, and let them be considered in the regular way; but I hope these general impeachments of the committee, these general abuses of the bill, will not be indulged too freely, as they only tend to unjustly discredit us in the eyes of the country. I have sometimes heard speeches like that made in industrial communities by agitators who were attempting to arouse the public against some supposed abuses, and so forth, but I regret to hear remarks of that kind made on the floor of this House in the consideration of a serious and important measure of this kind. Now, I presume the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is in favor of the so-called Plumb plan. If he is, he is the only one of the House whom I know or of whom I have heard that is in favor of it. And, judging by the way he attacked this bill, I presume if the committee had reported the Plumb plan here the gentleman from Alabama would have gotten up and made a general attack upon that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Not now, but in a moment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman makes a reference to my views, which is very unfair without yielding to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] yield?

Mr. DENISON. If I made any misstatement of fact, of course I will yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has just made one.

Mr. DENISON. What is it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. By saying that I favored the Plumb bill. The gentleman does not know anything about what I favor.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman favor the Plumb bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would say, if I had the time, that as between this vicious bill and the Plumb bill, I would take the Plumb bill.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I say.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But I do not have to take either one.

Mr. DENISON. I am glad to know that the gentleman favors the Plumb bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have not expressed my views. I prefer to express my own views on this floor. The gentleman has undertaken to express my views for me. The gentleman has not enough facts before him.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman stated this bill is providing a great income on $8,000,000,000, as I understood him to say, of water or wind, or whatever it was.

Now, gentlemen, no man can come on the floor of this House and make any proof whatever of that fact. In the year 1918 the amount of property of the railroads, the property investment accounts of all the railroads of the country, amounted to $18,574,297,873. In 1906, when the railroads began accounting to the Interstate Commerce Commission for every dollar of cash that was put into the railroads in the form of capital investment, the property investment of all the companies in the United States was $12,420,287,938. So that since that time, when actual accounting began under the law and under the rules of accounting of the commission, there has been the difference between $12,420,287,938 and $18,574,297,873, or more than $6,000,000,000, put into the roads in actual cash, which is accounted for with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, the gentleman says that of the $12,420,287,938 that all the railroads had invested before that time there was $8,000,000,000 of water. Under an act of Congress the Interstate Commerce Commission for several years past has been making an investigation of that subject, and actually valuing the physical properties of the railroads. Until they have completed their work, until they have made an actual physical valuation of the railroads——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I ask unanimous consent for four minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Until they have completed that work, I do not think anyone can properly go before the public with a statement like that which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has made, to the effect that there is $8,000,000,000 of their value that is water. We all know that it is not true. It is unreasonable. It could not be true, because we know that all the money that has been expended on railroads in this country prior to 1906 was more than $4,000,000,000. Now, we hope that the Interstate Commerce Commission will continue its work rapidly and conclude it soon, and have all the physical properties of the railroads of the country valued according to their actual value; then the country will know what their physical properties are actually worth, and if the valuation as shown by their books is found to be incorrect it can be corrected. In the meantime we can only take the best evidence we have, which is that shown by the records of the railroads themselves and by the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman bear in mind the further fact that the issuance of all securities now in the shape of bonds and stocks by the railroad companies is under strict supervision, not only by State authorities, but under the Federal Government, and is especially provided for in this bill?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is right. Of course, I think in the early days there may have been here and there improper issues of stocks and bonds and so-called water put into the railroad securities. But if so, it did not amount to a great deal, I think, in comparison with the entire amount of money invested in all the railroads of the country. Not only that, but there has been a great deal of money put into the railroads in the form of betterments and improvement that were paid for out of current revenues and that is not reflected in their stocks and bonds. And further than that, the property of the railroads has increased in value since the money was invested, so that any water put into them during the early days may have been more than absorbed by the general increases in values since that time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the gentleman got an estimate of the total valuation of the railroads up to this time?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. In 1918 it was $18,574,279,873. That has been increased to some extent since the Government took control over the railroads.

Mr. HOWARD. That was the capitalization when we took them over?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. As I showed here a while ago, in my remarks under general debate, the Government has increased that amount by over $1,000,000,000 since the Government took possession of the roads, so that now the property investment account of all the railroads amounts to over $19,000,000,000. And I do not think there is any justification at all for the criticism of this bill made by the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired. All time has expired on all amendments.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the section.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, in response to the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] as to my authority for saying that the "book value" of the railroads must be taken into account in fixing rates which are supposed to give fair and remunerative returns to the railroads, I refer Members of the House to page 65 of the bill, lines 9 to 21, inclusive, and to the clause which extends the standard return provided by the Government-control law to this bill. I venture to believe that not a single member of the committee will read over those lines, study the situation presented, and then put his reputation for intelligence at stake by saying that "book values" are not to be taken into consideration. Here is the law proposed:

> The commission shall be charged with the duty and responsibility of observing and keeping informed as to the transportation needs and the transportation facilities and service of the country, and as to the operating revenues necessary to the adequacy and efficiency of such transportation facilities and service. In reaching its conclusions as to the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, the commission shall take into consideration the interest of the public, the shippers, the reasonable cost of maintenance and operation (including the wages of labor, depreciation, and taxes), and a fair return upon the value of the property used or held for the service of transportation.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] complained that I made general criticisms. Members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce bringing out this bill have taken all the time for general debate, practically. Within the little time I am able to get under the five-minute rule I could not and can not go more fully and further into details.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman will excuse me. I have only five minutes, and the committee will not extend my time. If the gentleman can get me an extension of time, I will be glad to yield to him in the extension, but I do not want him to take up the little time I have.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not taken any time at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Did the gentleman ask for time?

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have consumed the time here.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman, if he had asked the committee for time, being a member of the committee, of course, would have gotten time. The committee took all the time it wanted. Let us not quibble about that.

Now, as I say, I do not know how much water there is in the railroads. Nobody knows. That is what I am complaining about. I am complaining of validating this water and giving it the value of real money without knowing how much water there is.

Experts have estimated that there is something like $8,000,000,000 of water in the railroads. I am not a statistician, and I do not know. I have introduced a resolution, House resolution 243, to investigate that matter. That resolution is now pending before the Committee on Rules. I have done the best I could to get hearings, and the committee has been kind enough to give me a couple of hours, but we have never been able to get a quorum of the committee together; three members is the most we could get. In that little time I have been able to lay before the Committee on Rules facts and statements which, in my judgment, amply justify the statement I made a moment ago, that there is a vast volume of water, perhaps $8,000,000,000 of water, in the securities, stocks, and bonds of the railroads.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] apologizes and says all the water has been squeezed out. How has it been squeezed out? That is what I would like to know. Why, so far as it has been squeezed out, to that small extent it has been squeezed out by the railroads capitalizing the gifts that the Government made to them of all the vast millions of acres of land by which the Government subsidized them and by plowing into railroad assets the fruits of the excessive charges and rates that they have taxed the people of this country to pay. I want to say to you that I for one ho'd that no such assets, no such gifts, and no such excessive rates and charges should ever or can ever justly become the basis of a tax upon the people of the United States in order to pay interest upon investments and remunerative returns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the section.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman withdrawing his motion?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. When used in this act—
> The term "commerce act" means the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended;
> The term "commerce-court act" means the act entitled "An act to create a commerce court, and to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1910;
> The term "Federal control act" means the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, as amended; and
> The term "Federal control" means the possession, use, control, and operation of railroads and systems of transportation, taken over or assumed by the President under section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, or under the Federal control act.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As a member of the committee I do not want the membership of the House to get the impression that all of the committee spoke through the mouth of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] when he spoke of what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] had said.

Gentlemen may contend that this bill does not breathe the breath of life into valueless securities of the railroad companies, but the bill does; and when gentlemen state that their opinion is that it does not, they merely admit that they have not had time to read understandingly the provisions of this bill since its introduction day before yesterday. It is in evidence and undenied that the securities, good, bad, and indifferent, bonds, stocks, and shares of the railway companies of America, approximate between $18,000,000,000 and $19,000,000,000. That includes all. The standard return paid by the Government under the Federal control act was over $900,000,000, approximating $1,000,000,000, and that is at the rate of 5 per cent on every share of stock and every bond, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent, and that guaranty has been projected for at least six months in this bill, with the difference that I spoke of yesterday that it only guarantees the road that does not make that much. The road that makes more than the standard guaranty pockets it. So, therefore, in so far as that is concerned, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] was absolutely correct when he said that this bill does breathe the breath of life into all railroad securities, good, bad, and indifferent.

Mr. DUNBAR. I move to strike out the last two words. I do this for the purpose of asking a question for information as to how the building of railroads in the future will be affected by this bill. The bill deals with the refunding of the debt due to the Government. It deals with the adjustment of the labor situation and other provisions which it is thought must be adjusted before the railroads of the country can successfully function as intended by their organization and as expected by the people of this country. Under the provisions of the bill, as has just been stated by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], there is to be an endeavor to stabilize these securities so as to enable their holders to receive a return upon their investment, but I submit that it is a fact that securities which have honestly come into the hands of holders will not be realized upon to the extent to which their holders are entitled under business conditions and business regulations. I will ask the chairman of the committee in what way will the provisions of this bill affect the construction of railroads in the country? Suppose it is thought desirable, in order to develop territory, to build a railroad 500 miles long or 1,000 miles long. What encouragement will any investor get from the enactment of this bill that will cause anybody to invest the necessary capital sufficient to construct a 500-mile railroad or a 1,000-mile railroad? Is it not a fact that under the provisions of this bill the rates will be regulated by public-service commissions and the return on the investment limited to such an amount that there will be no opportunity for investors to realize more than what could be obtained by loaning money at regular rates of interest? If there is any time left to me, I would like to have some member of the committee answer that question.

Mr. ESCH. The bill does not give any guaranty, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then, judging by past experience, would a new railroad ever be built?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and thousands of miles of railroad have been built under the rule of rate making that has been in effect up to this time, and dividend-paying roads prior to Federal control have averaged 5.61 per cent. I understand, of course, that hereafter there may not be the large development of new lines as prior to Federal control, because the trunk lines of the country are now practically established. The new construction will be more in the nature of short lines—to extend and develop and connect with the trunk lines.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then you do not anticipate that railroads will be built in the new territory where railroads are not now in existence?

Mr. ESCH. I think they will be built if there is traffic enough to justify their building. The trouble with many of our short-line roads is that they were constructed in territory where the commerce and business did not justify their construction. Hereafter communities so situated may doubtless be supplied by motor trucks at a cheaper rate.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then you expect that under the provisions of this bill there is not much opportunity or hope for new railroads to be constructed?

Mr. ESCH. I hope that under the administration of this bill, with the powers granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission and with the increased level of rates likely after Government control ceases, there will be developed a reasonable rate of return on legitimate railroad investment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in my time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the National Live Stock Shippers' League and the American Live Stock Association, signed by Mr. S. H. Cowan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the communication referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

H. R. 10453. Objections to requirements of section 417, paragraph (1), page 65, lines 14 to 21, specifying matters to be taken into consideration by the commission in determining matters of justness and reasonableness.

The sentence containing the requirements is as follows: "In reaching its conclusions as to the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, the commission shall take into consideration the interests of the public, the shippers, the reasonable cost of maintenance and operation (including the wages of labor, depreciation, and taxes), and a fair return upon the value of the property used or held for the service of transportation."

This provision should be stricken out, because it is an attempt on the part of Congress to place a limitation upon the facts to be considered and the results arrived at, or it is nothing; if the latter, why should it be inserted; and if the former, it should be sufficiently comprehensive to include all of the matters to be considered. Neither proposition can be supported, because the commission has never, except in the Import case, limited its decisions so as to in any wise exclude hearing the evidence and giving due consideration to each and all of the matters specified in the quoted section to which this objection is directed, together with all other pertinent facts.

In the case of Texas & Pacific Railway v. Interstate Commerce Commission (166 U. S., 197), the commission refused to consider the fact that traffic from New Orleans to California was imported and certain traffic originating at New Orleans destined to California was domestic. In determining whether a lower rate on the import traffic, as compared to domestic traffic, was unreasonable the Supreme Court, on page 219, thus states the rule respecting matters to be considered.

"The very terms of the statute, that charges must be reasonable, that discrimination must not be unjust, and that preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, corporation, or locality must not be undue or unreasonable, necessarily imply that strict uniformity is not to be enforced, but that all circumstances and conditions which reasonable men would regard as affecting the welfare of the carrying companies and of the producers, shippers, and consumers should be considered by a tribunal appointed to carry into effect and enforce the provisions of the act."

Thus no defined limitations should be attempted.

There are innumerable cases before the commission which by right the complainant is entitled to invoke the judgment of the commission; sometimes the complaint may involve an extensive and substantial part of the railroad traffic like lumber or coal and affect the system of rates thereon wherein these specified matters or part of them should be considered; in other cases the given controversy applies to a single commodity between certain points only which can not be judged at all by consideration of all of these comprehensive matters applicable to cases covering the bulk of the traffic. To place these restrictions upon the discretion of the commission in performing its function is to deprive the shipper of a fair consideration of his case by requiring a consideration of matters which can not for the most part affect the ultimate correct conclusion respecting his rights.

A fair return on the value of property is a right which a carrier may exact only on condition that the rates collected to produce it are just, fair, and reasonable. What is fair in turn depends on a multitude of matters, location, volume of business, management, waste, improvidence, and the like. It is universally held that the measure of that rate can not be predicated upon the mere necessities of the carrier. (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466; Reagan case, 154 U. S., 366; Gill case, 156 U. S., 649.) This doctrine is firmly established by the Supreme Court, universally recognized. If it is not intended by the provisions of this bill to change that rule it should be so stated; if it is intended to change it, then it has no advocate and would be a piece of reprehensible legislation.

We assert with absolute confidence that Congress can not specify in advance the facts that are to be considered by the commission or by the courts in order to determine what is reasonable in the multitude of cases and complexity of the varying conditions affecting the shippers, public, and carriers in cases to arise. This is demonstrated in the thousands of decisions rendered by the commission.

This provision has the distinction of being, so far as we are advised or have been able to ascertain, the first attempt to specify by statute the matters which the commission is to take into consideration. It is a tribunal appointed to exercise its expert judgment after ascertainment of pertinent facts. Let it do that.

The inclusion of taxes in connection with labor costs as an operating expense, which would cover war tax, if purposely included, is wrong; if by inadvertence, it only indicates how little consideration the public is to receive when everybody else must pay his share of the war tax and leave the carriers free; in neither case is it an operating expense like labor costs.

In behalf of the shipping interests and a fair and workable law to secure the ends of justice, we urge that this provision be stricken from the bill.

WASHINGTON, November 11, 1919.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BEE. Are we proceeding under the bill for amendment by sections, or discussing the general bill without regard to the sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read by sections for amendment.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have taken no part in the general debate. I have asked for 15 minutes that I may express my views on the pending bill. I approve of the bill as one written very comprehensively and clearly for the return of the railroads of the United States to private ownership, for the settlement of all matters arising out of Federal control, and for the refunding of the carriers' indebtedness to the United States. Also for continuing the existing rates, for the guaranty to the railroads after termination of Federal control, for new loans to the railroads, for the settlement of disputes between carriers and employers, first, by a railway labor board, and, second, by a railway court of labor appeals. Also for the settlement of car service, for the use of terminals and connections, for the consolidation, merger, and pooling, and for the issue of stocks and bonds.

I listened, as you all did, perhaps, to the very interesting explanation given by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce yesterday. The bill is very plain, easily to be understood, and I believe it should be enacted as it comes from the committee. The bill does not stand for further Government ownership by the Government of the United States. During the past two years the railroads, while under Government control, have been virtually under Government ownership.

On February 23, 1918, speaking upon the railroad bill providing for Government control, I said:

> When the war is over the question of Government ownership will have been settled forever, for I am sure that the future operation of the railroads by the Government during the war will result in such a failure to better our conditions that we shall be only too glad to return those roads to their rightful owners.

Mr. McAdoo, who took charge of the railroads for the administration under Government ownership, was glad after a few months to relinquish and abandon them. The President, who had charge of the railroads and stood once for Government ownership, was very pleased to say to Congress a few days ago that on the 1st day of January next he would return the roads to their owners.

The history of Government ownership in the United States of the railroads of the United States during the past two years, when written and understood, will disclose great extravagance of the Nation's funds, reckless and incompetent methods of administration, and must forever settle the question of Government ownership of railroads. I have not time in the few moments given me to discuss the absolute and utter failure of Government ownership for the last two years.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HERSEY. For a brief question.

Mr. RANDALL of California. In view of the statement that Government ownership has resulted in a failure, what does the gentleman say about the fact that the expert railroad men of the railroads of the country were brought here to run the railroads after the Government took control? Why has it been a failure?

Mr. HERSEY. There is a great difference between experts running a railroad owned by the Government and running a railroad owned by themselves.

Mr. RANDALL of California. What is the difference?

Mr. HERSEY. One great difference is the matter of incentive to make the roads better.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Then the experts wanted it to be a failure.

Mr. HERSEY. They did not care; they had no responsibility.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Could anybody have violated the trust without the permission of Director General McAdoo, and if he had violated a trust, would not the director general have the right and the power to dismiss him at once?

Mr. HERSEY. I am not spending my time defending Mr. McAdoo. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert as a part of my remarks the very clear statement of our able Speaker, Mr. GILLETT, on the failure of Federal ownership or control of railroads during the past year, given by him recently before the Republican Club of Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to insert as a part of his remarks the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentleman if it was a political speech?

Mr. HERSEY. No, sir; there is no politics in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement follows:

GILLETT DENOUNCES FEDERAL OWNERSHIP—WARNS THAT UNDER IT RAIL EMPLOYEES WOULD CARRY WAGES INTO POLITICS—CLASS RULE IS FOSTERED—WANTS ROADS TURNED BACK AND GIVEN LEEWAY TO UNITE UNDER CONTROL.

Opposition to Government ownership of the railroad and telegraph lines was voiced at a Republican club luncheon yesterday by Representative FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of Massachusetts, ranking Republican member of the House Committee on Appropriations and mentioned for Speaker.

"As a rule," Mr. GILLETT said, "I do not think operation of a business by a republic is efficient. It has a tendency to check initiative and invention, to locate improvements on the principle of the pork barrel rather than on real necessity, and to charge part of the cost of operation to the taxpayers rather than to the patrons. Our experience of the last year has not made Government ownership more popular.

WAGES ENTER INTO POLITICS.

"But there is another angle from which a member of an appropriating committee is forced to view it. All Government employees look to Congress to determine their scale of wages, so that becomes a political question. To the men interested it is the most important political question. And the opinion of each Member of Congress on that question, regardless of his other qualifications, is likely to determine the vote of those constituents who are interested.

"When the number of such constituents is small it is not important, but when they become numerous and organized they might profoundly affect elections. And a class is created (every one a voter, as Mr. McAdoo said) who have an interest in the election quite separate from others and of a nature so personal and vital to them as to be apt to control their vote.

"When some great and overshadowing issue sweeps the country, when our emotions are appealed to, as by the recent war, such questions of salary may be disregarded. But in normal times the Congressman who is seeking election will always have the selfish incentive to promise his vote for increased salaries and privileges quite irrespective of their merits, and the larger that class of Government employees becomes the more difficult will it be for a man to be elected who does not pledge himself to regard the interests of one class of his constituents first and the interests of the people as a whole second.

NO REMEDY DISCERNIBLE FOR THIS.

"That is a danger inherent in Government ownership for which I see no remedy. No one would advocate here the plan once adopted in England of disfranchising Government employees because they could not cast a disinterested vote.

"And so this is, to my mind, another practical argument in favor of turning back the operation of the railroads to their owners, give them a free hand to make such combinations and restrictions as tend to economical traffic, and then prevent them from exploiting the shipper and traveler by Government supervision.

"We ought never to go back to the preposterous and expensive condition which prevailed before the war, with numerous conflicting jurisdictions and authority and responsibility separate, but I trust we shall as soon as possible escape from the dangerous condition which prevails to-day."

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to call your attention to only one or two other things. In view of the able discussion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENTSON], who presented, a few moments ago, the figures showing the utter failure of Government ownership of railroads, I want to say that down in my State the Maine Central Railroad is one of the best-managed railroads in the Nation, and it has been so in the past. Their rolling stock, their equipment, and everything was complete at the time the railroads were taken over by the President. And yet, after a billion dollars had been given the railroads by the Government, these Government railroad managers came down in my State and went to the president of the Maine Central and wanted to give him a lot of this money. He told them that the road was complete, that they did not need any stock or equipment. But, in spite of that they sent to the Maine Central, during Government control, locomotives and box cars of the latest pattern, the best from the shops, to the amount of $3,215,392.48.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HERSEY. I can not at this time. The Maine Central refused to receive those cars and locomotives, which they did not need at all, but they have been delivered and charged up to the Maine Central, as they have in the case of many other railroads throughout the country. Railroads have been robbed and ruined by the Government in time of war by sending them equipment which they did not need, and charging it up to them, for which they must settle and pay in the days to come.

I wish to call attention, in passing, to something that happened here last evening. The very able and eloquent gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER], a new Member of the House, presented in a lawyerlike manner his views upon this bill in regard to an amendment to be offered by him placing an anti-strike provision in this bill, something like that in the Cummins bill in the Senate. I am opposed to that. I think any anti-strike provisions whatever placed in this bill making a strike unlawful, which would call for an injunction, would be not only an injury to the bill but to the industries of the country, and would widen the breach between capital and labor instead of healing it. Labor to-day in this country is in the hands of the radicals; it is in the control of the lawless foreign element.

The best part of the labor organizations have lost control. I want to see them get control again. You can not get that by making labor strikes unlawful in legislation. You can accomplish it better by an arbitration board, such as this bill provides, where labor and capital can get together, and where the decision of that board will meet the approval of the public, and public opinion will settle the matter after arbitration, and there will be no strike.

Mr. Chairman, when this House, a Republican House, cheers a Democratic Attorney General for his stand for law and order, when a Democratic President sends congratulations to a Republican governor elected in Massachusetts for his stand for law and order, when this House with but one dissenting vote expels from membership an anarchist, it is no time for us to widen the breach between capital and labor. [Applause.]

I wish, in closing, to call attention to my position in this House. I stand with the New York Commercial. In an editorial in that paper a few days ago headed "A call for real statesmen," it expressed opinions with which I fully agree, and I want you to listen to every word of it while I read it:

[From the New York Commercial.]

A CALL FOR REAL STATESMEN.

We may be approaching a crisis in our domestic affairs, if it has not already arrived. Judging by the hysteria manifested in official circles, one would think that there was no doubt on that score, and unless there is more poise shown in responsible quarters there certainly will be a crisis. Yet there need not be. Statesmanship of a high order can avert it. Radicalism has tried to seize control of affairs, and the attempt is sure to be harmful if it is not met with calmness and courage. Both in the administration and in Congress there are men who have made a keen study of economics, and they must know, and do know, how impossible are the proposals now being made or how destructive any attempts would be to put them in operation.

There should be no swerving from the course to be pursued. If it is right, it should be plainly stated and then adhered to. Because the radical element is making a loud noise is no reason why those who have the responsibility of action should cower and run or even compromise. The radicals have charted a wrong course, which should not be followed. It may come to a showdown. It may be that the issue will have to be met. If so, then we must meet it.

A knife applied to a cancer at its inception can cure it. If, through fear of giving pain, it is allowed to grow, it results in long-drawn-out suffering and death. The radical proposals now stirring Washington must be treated as they deserve. The best interests of the entire country must be considered, and not those of any particular class. The people of this country are naturally conservative. In times past they have been swept off their feet, temporarily, by unique proposals, but in the end they come back to common sense. In the present circumstances yielding, even to a degree, will be productive of harm that can not be undone by any subsequent change of opinion or policy. Is there not enough wisdom and courage in Washington to hold the ship of state steadily to its course?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I merely want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the oldest Member of this House, the gentleman from Illinois, Uncle JOE, became a great-grandfather this morning, and he was seriously disappointed because his grandchild is not a boy. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. I envy my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has read into the RECORD a statement from our distinguished Speaker asserting the utter failure of the Railroad Administration to properly function. May I ask the gentleman whether since May 19 our distinguished Speaker, who has been in absolute charge of legislation in this House, has done a single thing, or whether his party has done a single thing, to properly remedy that failure?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What?

Mr. HERSEY. I have not the time in the minute remaining me to go through the record.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish the gentleman would take two hours and try to tell us.

Mr. HERSEY. I wish I had two hours, and I will get them some day if I can on that point.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Senate and House passed Senate bill 641, which materially aided the situation.

Mr. HERSEY. Oh, a great many bills have aided the situation.

I wish to say again, in conclusion, that this is no time to widen the breach between capital and labor. This is a time to bring back what labor once wanted, a court of arbitration in labor matters. Establish a court like that provided for in this bill, perfectly impartial to both sides, and you will settle labor troubles on the railroads of this country, and the same principle can afterwards be extended to other labor troubles. I think if you remove from labor its one weapon—the strike—and give it nothing in its place you will have revolution in this country. I believe labor should be treated fairly, and we should not follow Mr. Lewis, nor Mr. Foster, nor even Mr. Gompers, but we should follow the men who stand for Americanism and not internationalism in this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The bill provides for a quasi court of arbitration. I am content with that provision, but pending that arbitration should a conspiracy to strike be lawful?

Mr. HERSEY. I will answer the gentleman. I consider under the present laws of this land, that a labor strike under certain circumstances can be made a conspiracy and be punished accordingly.

Mr. CANNON. The bill ought, then, to so provide. One other question. The gentleman, I think, with all of us, is delighted that the Federal court enjoined that conspiracy? [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. In answer to the question of our good friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I would like to say to him that I do not know of any strike that the railroad employees have developed while they have been considering the question in dispute. I do not believe they have had a strike of any magnitude since 1894.

Mr. CANNON. May I take just one minute?

Mr. HERSEY. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect whether the gentleman was present in 1916, when we passed the Adamson bill. I stand by the recommendations of the President made at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has again expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute, in order to make a further statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this in answer to the questions propounded, that I am in favor of an amendment to this bill in the matter of the arbitration court, providing that if labor does not abide by the arbitration decision that a strike then would be an unlawful act [applause], and then the strike would be enjoined.

Mr. CANNON. What does my friend say pending the arbitration—I am for the arbitration part of it—but pending that time, should labor which has resorted to arbitration be permitted to strike?

Mr. HERSEY. No. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the policy of the House will be. On several occasions I have permitted my colleagues to speak as long as they desired. The House has listened to them patiently, and I enjoyed their speeches, but when I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes or some Member on this side asks consent to proceed, the House becomes impatient. I desire to ask if it is the policy of the chairman of the committee to be just and liberal and not shut off debate; and if so, I will not object. I have ever since we met at 10 o'clock this morning and started the debate tried to get the chairman's eye, but it has been deflected to his left, and I have been unable to do so. I am not complaining, but I wish to know of the chairman of the committee what his policy will be. This is the third Member on the majority side who has spoken. However, I will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will not object; but may I say to the gentleman from Florida that notwithstanding the fact I have objected to the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaking, he was kind enough and magnanimous enough to ask that my time be extended, and I hope the gentleman from Florida will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not have to buy me off, and I am glad he is not doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. I shall object to 15 minutes, but I will not object to 10 minutes. The gentleman will have to make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may speak 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding for 10 minutes, but I want to serve notice here that whenever I am in the House from now on or until Saturday evening—and I will not be in the House a great deal of the time because of committee work—I am going to object whenever I am here to anyone proceeding for more than five minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] for his fairness in asking for the 10 minutes' time for me. I also want to answer a challenge made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] this morning as to what good results have been obtained by the mediation and conciliation boards. Right here, running into Washington when the men on a certain railroad property were about to leave the service, the management of that property asked for mediation and the railroad organization bowed to it and accepted mediation, and a settlement was effected that was agreeable to both sides, and in my opinion mediation is the only solution and the only way to settle differences. [Applause.] If I have a grievance and you do not agree with me, the only thing to do is to have somebody that will bring us together so we can consult, and when we do agree, then it is satisfactory to all concerned. That is the only method. [Applause.] Now, speaking again of what good the mediation and conciliation board has done, in answer to my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I will say, in 1916 the railroad organizations, while meeting in New York and representing all the railroad men in transportation service, were within a few hours of sending out notices withdrawing the men from the service because no settlement could be effected with the managers' committee. Again they bowed to mediation and the request of the President of the United States, and two hours after the President's request was made to the brotherhoods the representatives were on the way to Washington.

I have sat here day after day listening to Members of Congress blanching and accusing other Members of Congress with truckling to the railroad organizations. That is not the fact. The organizations, if anything, truckled to Congress when they obeyed the demand made by the board of mediation and the President and came here, although it is my opinion that one of the wisest things President Wilson ever did was to head off a great calamity, which was not of the railroad men's making. [Applause.] Now, again, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said this morning that organized labor sat up the night before last talking about the strike, and I presume the position taken by the Attorney General. If this was done, the result was that once more organized labor put its Government above itself and bowed to that Government. [Applause.]

Almost since the beginning of this session of Congress I have sat here and listened to abuse heaped upon the workingmen of my country and upon the leaders of organized labor, and I have previously remarked upon the floor of this Chamber that this is not the place to air hatred and hostility to the working classes, that this is not what Congress is here for, and it is not what is expected of this Congress.

On Tuesday evening, October 28, 40,000 American men and women, residents of this great city, held a demonstration of welcome in honor of that "grand old man," President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor. The demonstration was a sincere and voluntary tribute of love and confidence, and yet on the following day, October 29, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] tells this Congress that these 40,000 men and women were forced to march in the parade or pay a fine of $5. Another incorrect statement.

On the same evening that this parade was held I sat with other Members of Congress on the platform and listened closely and attentively to Mr. Gompers addressing an audience of nearly 10,000 people, and in all the words Mr. Gompers uttered there was not one word of abuse, not one uncharitable thought, not one un-American sentiment, only a plain statement of facts and a request for a square deal for the workingmen of this country.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield? What audience was that, what date was that?

Mr. BURKE. To 10,000 of the 40,000 American men and women who paraded.

Mr. KEARNS. When was that?

Mr. BURKE. On October 28. And in all the words Mr. Gompers uttered there was not one word of abuse, not one uncharitable thought, not one un-American sentiment, only a plain statement of facts and a request for a square deal for the workingmen of this country.

On Saturday afternoon, November 1, in this Congressional Chamber, for over an hour I listened to an argument about the hanging of the working people and the hanging of labor leaders, and one would have thought they were going to start right out on the hanging crusade. While all this was going on I thought of the great army of working people who served their country so loyally during the war, of the sacrifices they made for democracy. While Mr. BLANTON was making his talk my memory was busy recalling pictures of some of the men close to me who are in the labor movement. I thought of one of the leaders, James A. Nee, general chairman of the trainmen's organization on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, with four sons serving their country during the war, one of them now filling a soldier's grave; Mr. John Clair, another leader, and former general chairman of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers on the Baltimore & Ohio system, with four sons in service; innumerable men in all crafts of labor whom I know personally, who are active organization men, whose sons have been in service, some of them now lying in foreign graves, some of them returned home crippled for life. Twenty years ago a young sister of mine, dying, left her little family in my care; four of these boys, sons of a locomotive engineer, served their country; two of them are crippled for life, and one of them, 22 years of age, lies in a soldier's grave. Two boys of another deceased sister, their father a telegraph operator, served their country, but, fortunately, returned home safe.

There is hardly a time now that I make a railroad journey by night that I am not awakened by some one pulling the curtains of my berth, and I find some member of the crew, a heartbroken father, saying to me, "Bill, my boy lies in France. Is there not some way we can get his remains over here?"

Hardly a workingman's home but has felt the heavy hand of sorrow and care, either due directly to the war or to the epidemic of influenza that swept this country and which has been attributed to the war.

This is the reconstruction period of our country, the transition time from war to peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, can I have five minutes more?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of expeditious action on a bill that the Members of the House desire to have passed, I shall hereafter have to exercise my right in making objections.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object now?

Mr. ESCH. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BURKE. Never before in the history of our Nation was there greater need of level heads, sober judgment, and sane thought from the national representatives of the people as at the present time. [Applause.] Prejudice and biased feelings should be obliterated and every energy bent in an effort to bring about a feeling of stability and security in the country.

We are confronted with a wave of dissatisfaction and industrial unrest sweeping over the country—not confined to one class of workers in particular but to all classes in general, and this applies not only to the organized worker but to the unorganized.

There is some undercurrent at work, some hidden hand, some unseen and powerful force which is subtly getting in its work, using whatever means and power it can command to further its interest and procure its end. In my mind the fault is not with the working people of the Nation, but it is with that sinister, unseen power and force, representing the corporate power and wealth of the country, which has brought every pressure to bear to dishonor labor, and which has deemed this the opportune time to attempt to put the chains of slavery on the working people and destroy their organized effort.

What are the working people of this country confronted with? Attempts made on all sides to oppress them; criticism and abuse heaped upon them because they had the manhood to ask for an adjustment of grievances and relief from the exorbitant cost of living. Wages have not kept pace with the cost of living, the necessities of life are beyond the reach of many a workingman and his family, but he must suffer, his children must want, they must go without sufficient nourishment so that the profiteers may continue their profiteering and the dollars pile up at the cost of humanity.

I want to say to this Congress that I have sat here and listened to some Members who have taken advantage of this critical time to throw off the mask and show themselves in their true colors, the archenemies of labor, the foes of the working people. My blood has boiled with indignation at some of their absurd statements, their incorrect statements, their bitter and venomous attacks on the working people; and the only ray of comfort I could find was in the fact that if the people made the mistake of sending such men to Congress to protect their interest and to preserve the welfare of the Nation the mistake will never occur again, for they have showed in unmistakable terms that they are not representative of the people but of the special interests. And let me say here, too, that the special interests of the country are the instigators of the present industrial conflict. It seems to me that there is a well-defined movement on the part of organized capital started to destroy organization of the workers.

The power to strike is the only weapon labor has for the betterment of its condition in dealing with the combined power of corporate wealth and greed. No individual can protect his rights in dealing with organized capital, and it is a hard struggle and uphill work to do it collectively. And yet we hear talk of antistrike laws; in fact, bills carrying this feature have been presented for action. Everything and anything is being done to strip the workingman naked of any power of redress, of any means that will help him secure justice and enable him to live as an American workingman should live. You can not enact into law any bill that will make slaves of freemen. The people of the country will not stand for it. Instead of a Nation of law-abiding citizens we would have a Nation of lawbreakers. Compulsory servitude has no place in this Republic; the American people will not tolerate it, and the American people will not wear the chains of slavery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. BURKE. Just one minute, and I will have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE. Just one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object so long as the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not go beyond what he has written here.

Mr. BURKE. There is only one page.

Mr. BLANTON. I will not object if there is only one page.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he is willing now to take up the suggestion that I made a moment ago. The amendment involves the suggestion that the word "commission" in the bill be made to mean the "Interstate Commerce Commission," and so save using the term "Interstate Commerce Commission" throughout the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Virginia offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 17, after the word "act," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The term 'commission' means the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, if that be done, we ought to strike out the word "and," in line 10, and insert it after the word "act," in line 17.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ESCH moves to modify the amendment: Page 2, line 10, after the word "amended," strike out the word "and" and insert the same word after the word "act," in line 17.

Mr. ESCH. Changing the period after the word "act" to a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Clerk be authorized to change the words "Interstate Commerce Commission" to "commission" wherever they occur in the bill subsequent to this provision here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to change the words "Interstate Commerce Commission" and substitute the word "commission" wherever appearing in the bill subsequently to the amendment just adopted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED BOATS ON INLAND WATERWAYS.

SEC. 201. At the end of the last day of the month in which this act is passed all boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities, on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways (hereinafter in this section called "transportation facilities") acquired by the United States in pursuance of the fourth paragraph of section 6 of the Federal control act (except the transportation facilities constituting parts of railroads or transportation systems over which Federal control was assumed) are transferred to the Secretary of War, who, through the Chief of Engineers, shall utilize or operate such transportation facilities and assume and carry out all contracts and agreements in relation thereto entered into by or through the President in pursuance of such paragraph prior to the time above fixed for such transfer. All payments under the terms of such contracts shall be made out of moneys available under the provisions of this act for adjusting, settling, liquidating, and winding up matters arising out of or incident to Federal control. Moneys required for such payments shall, from time to time, be transferred to the Secretary of War as required for payment under the terms of such contracts. All other payments after such transfer in connection with the construction, utilization, and operation of any such transportation facilities, whether completed or under construction, shall be made by the Secretary of War out of funds now or hereafter made available for that purpose.

The utilization and operation of such transportation facilities shall be subject to the provisions of the commerce act, as amended by this act or by subsequent legislation, and to the provisions of the "shipping act, 1916," as now or hereafter amended, in the same manner and to the same extent as if such transportation facilities were privately owned and operated; and all such vessels while operated and employed solely as merchant vessels shall be subject to all other laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States is interested therein as owner, in whole or in part, or holds any mortgage, lien, or interest therein. For the performance of the duties imposed by this section the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint or employ such number of experts, clerks, and other employees as may be necessary, for service in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and as may be provided for by Congress.

Mr. ESCH, Mr. MADDEN, and Mr. MONTAGUE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "at the end of the last day of the month in which this act was passed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "on the termination of Federal control, as provided in section 200."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, section 200, providing for the termination of Federal control, was inserted by the committee, but through some oversight we neglected to make a like limitation in section 201. So this amendment is offered to make the same day of termination, if possible. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia, a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope the distinguished chairman of the committee will accept the amendment I now suggest. I move to amend on page 5, line 1, by striking out the word "War" and inserting the word "Commerce." In other words, that the operation of the transportation of these boats, barges, and tugs be transferred to the Secretary of Commerce rather than to the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 5, line 1, strike out the word "War" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Commerce."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, there is no possible reason, that I can conjecture, for concluding that the War Department has any special fitness for the operation of ships or water craft, to conduct the operation of barges and other floating craft upon canals and other waterways of our country. It is contended that the Engineering Corps of the War Department is best qualified. But the amendment I suggest does not interfere with the work of the Engineering Department, and the Engineering Department of itself has no special qualifications to deal with the actual operation of water craft.

Indeed, I think if you would search the Government over you would not find a department of the Government whose inherent qualifications more unfit it for this particular task than the War Department. I do not make that as a criticism of the War Department, but simply as a statement of the conditions inherent in the nature, object, and work of the War Department itself. There is no reason why a soldier should know how to operate water craft. The Navy Department might naturally be considered, but I do not think that department would be specially qualified for the particular marine work incident to the operation of barges. It is a commercial undertaking, and it seems more appropriate and more in keeping with the purposes of the act that the Department of Commerce should do this work rather than the War Department.

Mr. ESCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to oppose an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, or to oppose his judgment in matters of this kind. But the committee and the subcommittee, after full consideration, thought it wise to give this jurisdiction over operation on inland waters and canals, through the War Department, to the Chief of Engineers. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia merely substitutes the word "Commerce" for the word "War," but that would still leave untouched the language in the bill, namely, that this power that you confer upon the Secretary of Commerce should be exercised through the Chief of Engineers. That, it seems to me, would be rather incongruous.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My purpose was, if this amendment were agreed to, to propose a similar change in subsequent paragraphs of the bill to comport with it.

Mr. ESCH. I am glad to note that; but that does not go to the objection that I mentioned. I do not think there is any agency in the Government up to the present time that has had more to do with the inland water transportation than the War Department, through the Chief of Engineers. They have jurisdiction of the improvements of inland navigation upon the inland waters. They have large experience in transportation matters, because they have their fleets in every district along these rivers, and they have an equipment already of boats, barges, towboats, house boats, and so on, and they, therefore, have had some experience in operation.

But the main thing is that we, by the rivers and harbors act of 1914, put in a provision for $500,000 to be expended by the Chief of Engineers in the construction of experimental tows and barges to be operated on the Mississippi River, and that work has been going on under the auspices of the Secretary of War, through the Chief of Engineers, so that they have had that experience. The Chief of Engineers sent officers to Europe to find out the best plans for tows and barges. They have investigated various types of tows and barges and the loading and unloading devices to be found in every city and every port of any importance in Europe. They have had a vast fund of experience, and therefore it seems to me there is no other agency in the Government to which we can designate these duties of operating these Government fleets upon the inland waters than the Corps of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in opposition. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Does the Chair say that all time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I speak in behalf of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House, and I would like to ask that all amendments to this paragraph, in so far as they are related to the instrumentality for the operation of these ships and boats on inland waters, be passed over for the day, inasmuch as the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has called a special meeting for to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock to consider this very paragraph and other paragraphs in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that action on the amendment to this paragraph transferring jurisdiction from the Secretary of War to other parts of the Government be passed over until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects. Does the gentleman from New York desire to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. ROWE. I do.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the Secretary of War has operated, through the War Department, a large number of ships during this war; but now many of the ships on the ocean operated by the Secretary of the Navy, and a large proportion of those operated by the Secretary of War, have been turned back to the United States Shipping Board. The Shipping Board has a department of operations. They are better qualified to-day to take over this work than any other department. They are the one organization in the whole Government that is equipped to operate ships from the commercial point of view. It seems to me that the Shipping Board should have the opportunity to make this operation and to control these ships and boats on the inland waters.

I therefore offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment, that in place of the Secretary of War we substitute the words "United States Shipping Board."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment by way of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. ROWE for the amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 5, line 1, after the word "of," strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "United States Shipping Board."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think either the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] or the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] is preferable to the provision in the bill reported by the committee.

The War Department is inappropriate for the operation of these boats. What boats are referred to in this paragraph? Under section 6 of the Federal control act the President was authorized to build certain boats and operate them upon the inland waterways of the United States. Under that authority the United States Railroad Administration are engaged in building boats for operation on the lower Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans, and on the Warrior system of rivers, and are also constructing and operating boats on the Erie Barge Canal. The President, out of a fund which he controlled, early in the war authorized an allotment out of that fund for construction of boats on the upper Mississippi River between St. Louis and St. Paul, but it is my understanding that the necessary funds were subsequently allotted by the Shipping Board. They represent attempts to operate water lines upon very important waterways of the country. The country is very much interested that the demonstration which is being made shall be successful. Success depends upon training, skill, and experience; and while yielding to no one in my admiration for the Corps of Engineers in their particular sphere, I submit that neither by training nor experience are they skilled as transportation operators.

Now, I think the chairman [Mr. ESCH] is mistaken about the operation of towboats on the Mississippi by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department. They were authorized, in a river and harbor act some years ago, to investigate and experiment for the purpose of devising the best type of towboats and barges, and they have made a valuable and voluminous report, and are probably studying the matter further. Now, as between the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia and the substitute of the gentleman from New York, I prefer the substitute of the gentleman from New York; that is to say, that they be turned over to the United States Shipping Board.

At a conference held here in Washington between some Senators and Representatives and a number of other gentlemen throughout the country who considered this matter, after careful deliberation they determined that the United States Shipping Board was the best Federal agency to whom to turn over these boats; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia shall not be adopted, I hope that the substitute of the gentleman from New York will receive the approval of the committee.

I have no purpose in this discussion except to contribute to the success of water transportation upon these very important waterways of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw my amendment and accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York. It is very satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that the very boats he mentioned here have actually been turned over by the War Department to some other authority and are now being operated by others than the War Department.

Mr. SMALL. I was referring to the upper Mississippi River between St. Louis and St. Paul, and I said it was my understanding that the original fund for the construction of towboats and barges to operate on the upper Mississippi was allotted by the President out of a fund at his disposal, but that subsequently the Shipping Board took independent action and allotted money out of their own funds for their construction, and that they are engaged in the construction of those boats. As to that I am not entirely sure. It may be that the War Department is constructing the boats, but the money is furnished by the Shipping Board. I am quite sure that is correct. But the point I am endeavoring to emphasize is that this is not an engineering matter. It is a question of operation of common carriers by water, and we need skill and experience in order to demonstrate that they can be successfully and profitably operated in the interest of the public. We have an opportunity to rehabilitate commerce upon the great Mississippi River and to use the Warrior system, one of the most important systems of rivers upon the Gulf, upon which Congress has expended millions of dollars. We have an opportunity to help duplicate the success of the Erie Canal. Let us have these boats operated by men who are familiar with the needs of commerce and the operation of these boats.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether the Shipping Board at this time is undertaking any control of inland-waterway transportation, or whether this is the first time it has come within its jurisdiction?

Mr. SMALL. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question. Under the act creating the Shipping Board they were denied jurisdiction of inland transportation, and the distinguished chairman of the committee so stated in his introductory speech; but that constitutes no reason why we may not now confer upon the Shipping Board authority to operate these boats upon inland waterways, and I think we made a mistake in excluding jurisdiction of inland waterways from the United States Shipping Board at the time the original act was passed.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to ask the gentleman if the Engineering Corps of the War Department has not now representation on the Inland Waterways Committee, and if they have not been intimately acquainted with the operation of boats on the Warrior River as well as on the Mississippi, and is it not a fact that the most friendly governmental agency to the development of water transportation is the Engineering Corps of the War Department?

Mr. SMALL. The operation of these boats on the Warrior and other systems is by the United States Railroad Administration. The gentleman is assuredly correct in stating that the Army Engineers, many of whom are devoting a large portion of their time to river and harbor work, are, of course, in sympathy with the improvement of the rivers and harbors and their successful demonstration for the purposes of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. I feel like apologizing to the committee for taking up any time on this amendment, but, in view of the fact that there ought not to be any controversy between the War Department and the Shipping Board, I feel justified in saying this: The river barges and boats now being operated by the Government are operated under the provision of the railroad-control act authorizing the President to invest a certain amount of money in the experimental operation of boats and barges upon the canals and waterways of the country. As was stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the act creating the Shipping Board did not give them jurisdiction over inland waterways, and the Shipping Board has not exercised any such jurisdiction during its existence.

Therefore it has built up no organization within itself for the accumulation of information with reference to inland waterways, and knows no more about the situation of canals or rivers than any other Government body that has had nothing to do with them.

The Railroad Administration soon after its organization created an inland waterways division for the operation of boats, and in the management of that division they drew together a crew of experienced men on the inland waterways of the United States. The Railroad Administration is to cease when the roads are turned back and could not any longer operate the boats or barges.

When the committee considered to what agency they ought to be turned over, we found ourselves confronted with this situation: That there had to be created a new agency in place of the Inland Waterways Division in the Railroad Administration or to turn these over to some other agency already created. Nobody knows how long they will be necessary, because Congress can come in with a law at any time directing the Government to dispose of the boats and barges to some private purchaser.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman inform us what provision there is in the Senate bill as to this matter?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate bill provides that they shall be turned over to the Shipping Board. There is no bureau of the Shipping Board that is authorized to operate boats. They do not even operate the vessels on the ocean; they have created within the Shipping Board an Emergency Fleet Corporation to operate ships which the Shipping Board constructs. There is no bureau of the Shipping Board for the operation of boats. So if the Senate provision should prevail and the Shipping Board should be given jurisdiction, they will have to create an independent agency within the Shipping Board to operate the boats, because under the law they have no jurisdiction to do that.

In view of the fact that the Corps of Engineers is better acquainted with the traffic, that they have had charge of river and harbor improvement, we felt that they were better qualified to manage the operation of boats and barges until some permanent policy should be adopted by Congress than any other agency.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. While the gentleman is correct in the statement that the Shipping Board as such does not now operate the vessels, but that this is done by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the original shipping act contemplated that the Fleet Corporation should go out of existence and that its functions should be taken over by the Shipping Board, and the legislation passed by the House last week reinforced and emphasized this and clearly provided that the Shipping Board should in due course of time take up the work.

Mr. BARKLEY. Nobody can predict whether that will become a law or not, and we are trying to meet the present situation.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It will be recalled that on Saturday last the House of Representatives nearly unanimously passed the first merchant marine act, and in that act it was provided that certain measures should be carried out by the United States Shipping Board. I am in full accord with the proposition that they should take up this part of the work, and I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I think the amendment should prevail in the interest of what will be best for the merchant-marine interests of this country. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered now is to put the operation of these Government boats on inland waters into the hands of the Shipping Board, and it will not in my opinion bring about the result desired because in the Shipping Board act there is no power given the Shipping Board to operate vessels. It is not an operating agency or instrumentality of the Government. The operating agency is the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I do not believe that we should give control over operation to the Shipping Board.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The Engineering Corps of the Army is now fully acquainted with all present plans and methods for the operation of barges on the Mississippi and the Black Warrior Rivers. They have had much to do with the construction of these barges and have been associated with the Inland Waterways Commission in the operation of the same, and much of the work of the Inland Waterways Commission has been performed by the Army Engineers. I have yet to hear complaint from friends of these waterways against the Engineer Corps of the Army. If you wish to feel absolutely assured that the operation of these barge lines are in hands friendly to water transportation, leave it to the Engineer Corps of the Army. They have in the past fought the battles of water transportation, and it would be a serious mistake on the part of those friendly to inland waterways to suffer any change in the recommendation of the committee that this work be transferred to the Secretary of War, acting through the Chief of Army Engineers. I happen to know that the Army Engineers are intimately acquainted with almost every phase of this work on the Black Warrior River, and there is no waterway promising a better demonstration of the success of water transportation than does this river.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Not now. A number of improved barges are now in course of construction to be operated on the Black Warrior and the Mississippi. The Engineer Corps of the Army is thoroughly familiar with what has been and is now being done. They have been associated with the Waterways Commission in all of its work, and are equipped and prepared to carry on this work. They have officers stationed at New Orleans, Mobile, and St. Louis who are thoroughly familiar with the entire project. You can thus make no mistake in adopting the recommendation of the committee in this matter, and only in this way can you know that no one unfriendly to river transportation will be intrusted with this important work during its experimental test.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMALL) there were—ayes 21, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 4, line 10, strike out lines 10 to 16, inclusive, and insert——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that that paragraph has been passed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the Chair that I was ready to offer this amendment when the Clerk started to read the first line of the next section, but I did not get the opportunity to do so. I rose in my place to do it, but the Chair did not recognize me. There was no intention upon his part not to do that, but I ask unanimous consent now to return to that section for the purpose of offering this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to the previous section for the purpose of offering the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that I do not object.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not care, if the gentleman wishes to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. No objection is heard, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 10, strike out lines 10 to 16, inclusive, and insert:
"(c) So much of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, as authorizes the President in time of war to take possession and assume control of any system of transportation, or part thereof, and utilize the same, is hereby repealed."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the President took over the railroads of the United States under the act which I seek by this amendment to repeal. Under Government control we find the country in this condition: Railroad rates were increased to yield an additional revenue of about $1,100,000,000 a year. For the two years of Government control $2,200,000,000 will have been collected in excess freight and passenger rates. Five hundred million dollars were appropriated by Congress when the roads were turned over to the Government. Two hundred and thirty-eight million dollars were reported at the end of the first fiscal year as a deficit, making in all $1,838,000,000 of expense to the people of the United States for the experiment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In one moment, when I have finished my statement. At the beginning of the present fiscal year, or rather since this session of Congress began, Congress appropriated $750,000,000 more, and the reports from the Railroad Administration indicate that for the first three months of the year there was a loss of $250,000,000. The $750,000,000 and the $250,000,000 added to the $1,100,000,000 which the Government will collect as excess freight and passenger rates, if no other loss follows, will make $2,100,000,000 for this year, and that, with what we have expended during the past year, will make an expense to the American people of $4,000,000,000, substantially, for the Government experiment in the operation of the railroads.

I do not believe that the law under which the President was permitted to take the railroads over should be allowed to stand. If another emergency shall arise in the future, the Congress of the United States could authorize the President at that time to do whatever may be needed under the circumstances. To say that because the President did take over the railroads by authority of Congress when an emergency arose before is reason why that authority shall continue forever, can not be justified. The Congress will be in existence as long as the country lasts, and I assume that Members of it will be as patriotic in the future as they always have been in the past. They will be ready to accord to the President any power that may be needed to meet any emergency that may arise, whenever that emergency may come, but until the emergency does arise there should be no power in the President of the United States to take over the property of the people, whether it be in railroads or anything else. If the Congress of the United States declares war, and it is the only body of the country that has that power, when it does so, the emergency is here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], for several reasons. First, the gentleman's amendment is based upon the assertion, which is in large measure true, that the taking over of the railroads by the Federal Government under the provisions of the act, now existing, made it extremely expensive to the public, and he cited figures to show that that assertion is correct. There is no denying that fact, but what is one of the potent reasons why that expense was entailed? One of the reasons why the expense was entailed was because there was no act existent at that time authorizing Federal control of the railroads during the emergency. In other words, the Congress passed the act after considerable labor and study, and after it was passed the administration thereof necessarily was in part defective by reason of its newness, and therefore this large expenditure, waste, and extravagance, if any there was. Therefore if we have upon the statute books an existing law permitting the Government in time of crisis and in a period of impending war to take over the railroads, we necessarily, in my judgment, avoid a large proportion of this expense of which the gentleman complains. Now, let me state another reason. History has shown that England passed a law years and years ago giving the Government power to take over the roads in the very instant that war was declared or whilst war was imminently impending, and the consequence was that when this war was declared on the other side of the ocean England was ready at once to take possession of the railroads and its transportation facilities as a means to the advancement of the prosecution of the war. One of the great delays we had in preparing for the war, in getting our munitions to the seaboard, in transporting troops, in making the necessary arrangements for transportation to get into the war, which we knew was to come certainly, arose from the fact that we did not have then an existing law similar to that of England, namely, that instanter there should be a conversion of the railroads for war purposes——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman tell the committee, if he will, whether or not it might not be wise to repeal this for the reason that in the passage of another act we may provide different terms than the terms we now provide, namely, that payment shall be made to the railroads for the period of Government control based on the average earnings for three years, whereas we might not do that the next time?

Mr. DEWALT. I grant you, my dear sir, that possibly this act now upon the statute books is in part defective, but we can remedy that by amendment instead of by repeal.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The provision which the gentleman from Illinois seeks to strike out is only that section of the national defense act passed in 1916 that enables the President to take over the roads in time of war and does not have reference to the details of compensation that we fix in the emergency act of 1918.

Mr. DEWALT. Another thing is to be said, if there be defect in the existing law in regard to taking over the railroads in time of emergency by the President of the United States and the director general, all those defects can be remedied from time to time as they become apparent, and it seems to me it would be suicidal to repeal now an existing law, because we may have an emergency at any moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask one question. The gentleman from Illinois made the statement here awhile ago that we have lost about $4,000,000,000 in our transactions with the railroads under Federal control. The committee states it at $600,000,000. Now, the gentleman from Illinois is an old Member here and he is probably correct. If he is, I would like to know how he accounts for the difference between the $4,000,000,000 and the $600,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in any statement made by the committee reporting this bill that they always overlook the fact that the Railroad Administration has collected $2,200,000,000 in excess freight and passenger rates and have expended it all, and, while it does not come out of the Federal Treasury, it has come out of the pockets of the American people, which is the same thing. Then they overlook the fact that we are not going to get, in my judgment, any money back we appropriated for any losses that have been sustained by the Railroad Administration, in which case there will be an item of $4,000,000,000 rather than $600,000,000 as the committee reported.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, of course, puts an entirely different light in regard to the amount of money that has been expended in connection with the Government-managed railroads. Now, the committee also tells us that if the railroads are returned to private ownership again we are going to have a reduction in rates, or at least the same rates we have now, and also that we are going to have efficient management of the railroads. But, in the opinion expressed by one of the men connected with the railroads, he said that if the conditions next year are the same as they are now in regard to operating expenses that they have to have a 25 per cent increase in freight rates. Now, that does not quite clear up the situation. If we are going to return these roads to private ownership, we then ought to have the assurance we are going to have the same rates we now have or possibly a reduction and not a substantial increase.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Gentlemen, there is no use now in using language that misleads or deceives anybody or is likely to do it. Now, let us look the question fairly and squarely in the face. When we use the word "deficits" in ordinary use, it means a deficit in expenses of operation; that is, that the railroad has not paid its way. Now, the meaning of deficit referred to here is that the Government lacked that much of having made operating expenses and the rental due the roads. Now, last year my recollection is that the net earnings of the roads that could have been used in payment of dividends were as large or larger under war control than they were prior thereto.

But Congress authorized the making of an extravagant contract of the rental, and did it purposely. We gave them a rental equal to the average net earnings for the three best years the roads ever had since railroading began in the United States. Now, do you suppose, if we had not taken them over, they could have made such a return under war conditions? I do not think so. The rental was severely criticized on this side and on the Republican side of the House. It was severely criticized in the Senate as being extravagant. But, as I said, we had to take the railroads over. The very necessity of operating them in a way to win the war made it necessary to take them over. It will be some time after the war is over before ordinary conditions will return which have been disturbed by reason of war operations. And the deficit was not a deficit at all in the ordinary sense. We lost on our rental contracts. That is all there is of it. Talking about the deficit in the first year means that we did not make the rent contract in addition to expenses of operation. To whom does this extravagant rent go? To the owners of the railroads. Who are they? The people of the United States—the stockholders and bondholders. It is not a loss at all to the whole country. It may be a loss to the Treasury, but all the people put the money in the Treasury, and it is paid back to a part of them. It was no loss at all; that is, no loss to the Nation as a whole.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. You say they took the money away from me, and will pay it back to me. They increased my railroad fare, and I have no railroad bonds. Where do I get my money back?

Mr. SIMS. Where would you have gotten it if the railroads had increased the fares, as it would have been absolutely necessary if the roads had not been taken over?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I have traveled for 2 cents a mile.

Mr. SIMS. The roads increased rates 15 per cent before being taken over, and may have increased rates much more than they have been. They could not have gotten along without it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I oppose this method of meddling with the military legislation of this country. We have been treated time after time to a situation such as is about to be presented here now. The Military Committee of this House has been in continuous session and has produced a line of military law the like of which no country in the world has ever enjoyed before. And when the Military Committee of this House finds that it can not hold its sessions during the time that this House is in session, but must get permission from this House to continue in session while the House is in session, while all of the Members of that body, that is making a special study of the military plans of this country, are absent, attending to the military affairs of this Nation, men come into this House and propose amendments to the military law which sets at naught——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In just a minute. That sets at naught the labor of this committee that has been appointed by this House to do that particular kind of work.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from New York know that the legislation which my amendment proposes to repeal did not emanate from the Military Committee?

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman would have waited about two minutes I would have told him that thing. It so happened that we passed in this House a national-defense act, reported by the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, in which a clause very similar to the one now sought to be repealed, that was put into an appropriation bill by the Senate committee on a general military appropriation——

Mr. BLACK. It was your own appropriation.

Mr. CALDWELL. It was, but it was put on by the Senate and the members of the Military Committee were here and agreed to it, and it went on the bill then. And to repeal this act now only destroys half of the legislation that is now on the statute books, because the Hay bill provision has never been repealed, and should not be repealed, for this reason: When we were taking over the various properties of the United States for war purposes, among them factories and buildings of all kinds, it was found that we could go to men who otherwise would not part with their property or the possession or control of it for anything like a reasonable figure and show them the Hay bill that carried this provision; then if they did not let us have it for a price we thought was fair we would put an appraisal upon it, and if they did not let us have it at the appraised value we could pay them 75 per cent of it and let them sue in the courts for the balance. On almost every one of those occasions the propositions made by the Government were accepted, and the people were glad to get what the Government offered them as being a fair value, and profiteering was at a minimum. The same thing was expected to be done here. But that was not accomplished to a full extent. We passed the railroad measure, and, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] said, the criticism on that side of the House was that we were paying too much, but the Members of this House and of the Senate realized it was necessary to take these transportation facilities and take them at once; and, to keep out of the courts, decided that if it was necessary to pay too much to buy our peace, we would pay it and get a peace with the arms of our country from the enemy abroad and after that we would settle with the railroads. That is what we are doing now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of correcting what I think is an erroneous statement of the provisions of the Federal-control act with reference to compensation to the carriers. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] have said that the bill was criticized at the time it passed the House because it carried a provision for too much compensation for the railroads. I desire to recall to the attention of the House the fact that the provisions of the Federal-control act did not cover the definite amount of compensation, and the only thing that that act did was to provide that the executive department should not pay beyond a certain maximum fixed in the Federal-control act. And that act has this provision:

SECTION 1. That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation an annual sum, payable from time to time in reasonable installments, for each year and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, not exceeding a sum equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

If there is any criticism coming to any branch of this Government with reference to overpayment to the carriers, that criticism should be directed to the executive department of the Government. I am not making the criticism. It is a matter which would have to be investigated before anyone would have any opinion of value, but it is not accurate to undertake to make any criticism against Congress for fixing a definite sum which was excessive in payment for the use of the railroads.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on the amendment—upon the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Have I not the right to oppose the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the purpose of this bill is to provide for the early return of the railroads to their owners and for private operation thereafter under a more effective and comprehensive public control than has heretofore been the case. I have no disposition to criticize the Railroad Administration in its management and operation of the roads while they have been under Government control. Criticism is always easy to indulge in, and especially is this true as to activities during a great war when conditions are so abnormal. There have been large increases in freight and passenger rates since the Government took control, and heavy additional expenditures for wages, materials, and other elements which enter into railroad operation, and on account of the fact that these expenditures have increased in a greater ratio than the rate increases a large deficit has ensued and has been met by payments from the Public Treasury; but when we stop to consider the decreased purchasing power of the dollar which the war brought about and the consequent rise in the value of all materials that go into the cost of operation, and also the necessary increases in wages, we are forced to admit that a large increase in the expenditures of the railroads under Government management was to have been expected, and that much of it may justly be charged off as a war loss.

But, even so, making allowance for all these things, and entirely free from any feeling of hostility and criticism of the Railroad Administration, I think that the experience has been a convincing one that Government ownership and operation would not be wise and that private ownership and operation, under effective public control, will bring out a greater degree of individual initiative and enterprise and will render a large and more satisfactory service to the public than any other system. There is nothing new or novel about this experience, and it only conforms with that which events have demonstrated to us time and time again in the past.

Under a system of government which has given approval and encouragement to private initiative and individual ability, our Nation has far outstripped other countries where greater socialistic tendencies have prevailed, and nowhere on earth, in Europe, Asia, Africa, or far-away Australia, is prosperity so generally distributed and the standards of living so high as here in the United States of America. Of course, these standards are not as high as we want them to be, and are not as high as we are, in fact, going to have them to be as time goes on, but it would be the height of folly for us to throw away the machinery and tools which have made possible our achievements in the past and take up some of the visionary and untried experiments which are being urged at the present time.

Under our system of private ownership of railroads capital has had a better encouragement and a safer return than in any nation in the world; labor has received higher wages and has had better working conditions than in any other country; and, most important of all, the public has received a better service at a lower cost over what is admittedly the greatest system of railway transportation in all the world than is given anywhere else. Therefore we would be foolish to abandon it for the more socialistic experiment of Government ownership under the Plumb plan or any other guise.

Ever since the war began we have had a considerable number of theorists and political tinkers press on to Washington proposing that every field of private endeavor shall be invaded by the Federal Government. Railroads, mines, telegraph and telephone systems, schools, land, and almost everything else has been the object of their solicitude and care, with the end in view to own and operate them from Washington by functionaries and huge armies of Government employees. Under their system some fifteen-hundred-dollar clerk would be more powerful than the governor of a State, for he would write an order and some bureau chief would sign it, and the citizens of the country would disobey it at their peril. The American people expect us to be on guard and see to it that this country is not transformed into a bureaucracy.

John Fiske, the great historian, said: "If the day should ever arrive—which God forbid—when the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects sent from Washington, on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end and the hopes that have been built upon it for the future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever." There does not seem to be any impending danger of any calamity like that happening to our Government at least during the present generation. For the heart of the American people is evidently sound to the core and determined to protect itself from foes within and foes without.

The cause of excessive costs when governments undertake business activities is simple. All the activities of any government are necessarily carried on by political machinery, and that machinery is wholly unsuited to the economic field. The field of government and the field of business are dissimilar and separate. The proper field of government is mainly the regulation of conduct and the protection of the rights of the individual. The field of business is the production and the utilization of material things. The principles, the methods, and the machinery of government are wholly different from those of economic activities and are not adapted nor adaptable to the latter. To say this is in no way to criticize and belittle the Government in the exercise of its legitimate functions. It is true that Government operation of the railroads has been, at least prior to the Great War, measurably successful in Germany, but the very reasons which under the Prussian system made it fairly successful in that country are the reasons why under our form of government, with the spirit and traditions of the American people, I think it would be unsuccessful here. Here in this country we have government by political parties, with the power to change President every four years and the power to change the complexion of Congress every two years, and it would be little short of disaster to get the whole great question of transportation, freight rates, wages of railroad employees, and other related questions tied up in political controversies and made the football ofpolitics. I can not conceive of anything which would be more likely to array one section of the country against the other or one group of citizens against the other than this would. It would be impossible to prevent it under our policy of party government and political contests.

I think we have the best Government in the world, and will continue to have so long as we confine our activities to governmental functions, but when we branch out beyond that we are liable to meet with failure. Mr. Glenn E. Plumb, the author of the Plumb plan, admitted the weakness of Government ownership in his recent testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where he appeared in advocacy of the Plumb plan. Mr. SWEET, of Iowa, a member of the committee, asked him this question:

If the United States Government is to put up the money to buy the railroads, then why should the United States Government not operate them itself instead of adopting your plan?

To which Mr. Plumb replied:

Because we do not believe in operation by any Government body. We do not believe this great industry can be conducted by a political autocracy. If we leave operation in the hands of political appointees, we would place the railway system ultimately in the hands of politicians, and that, we submit, can not safely be done.

I think there is much force in this statement, for the very reason which I have already given, but I do not agree that Mr. Plumb's plan would be any better, because there would be just as much danger from the system he suggests as the one he criticizes, and even more so, for under our system of government the party politician is responsible for his acts to the entire public, while under his plan the members of the board which he would put in control would have the strong temptation of regarding themselves responsible only to their own particular constituencies. But I will not enter into any comprehensive discussion of Government ownership at this time, because the mind of the public seems to be pretty generally made up on that question, and therefore I shall content myself with what I have just said and what I have said on other occasions in the House on this particular subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 203. The President shall have the right, at all reasonable times until the affairs of Federal control are concluded, to inspect the property and records of all carriers whose railroads or systems of transportation were at any time under Federal control, whenever such inspection is necessary or appropriate (1) to protect the interests of the United States, or (2) to supervise matters being handled for the United States by agents of the carriers, or (3) to secure information concerning matters arising during Federal control, and such carriers shall provide all reasonable facilities therefor.

Such carriers shall upon the request of the President, or those duly authorized by him, furnish all necessary and proper information and reports compiled from the records made or kept during the period of Federal control affecting their respective lines.

Any carrier which refuses or obstructs such inspection, or which willfully fails to provide reasonable facilities therefor, or to furnish such information or reports shall be liable to a penalty of $500 for each day of the continuance of such offense, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action to be brought by the United States.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to criticize the committee that had this bill under consideration. I have had many letters from my district, asking me to tell them how I stood upon what is known as the Esch bill, and I have written back to the writers stating that the bill was in subcommittee, and from the subcommittee I could secure no information, and therefore I did not know what the bill would contain.

I find in the report the following: "The bill was introduced June 2, 1919." Then "The committee, after giving notice that hearings would begin on a given date, being delayed because of the necessity of giving consideration to and securing the passage of important measures, began hearings on July 17. These hearings continued with morning and afternoon sessions continuously until September 27. Some 3,500 pages of testimony have been printed. Exclusive of the printed hearings, numerous exhibits were filed. Proponents of various plans were first heard. These were followed by witnesses," and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, the "important measures" that we passed were for a bridge across the Susquehanna River; another one for a bridge across the Susquehanna River; another one for a bridge across the Susquehanna River; one for a bridge across the Snake River; another for a bridge across the Mississippi River; another for a bridge across the Pend Oreille River; one for a bridge across the Sulphur River; and several others, and the appropriation bills which were left over from the last session because of the filibuster. I do not criticize the committee because they could not take up this important bill in view of these important measures which were before the House; but I would like to state that this committee began its hearings on July 15 and continued them until September 27, or more than two months. The subcommittee had the bill under consideration from September 27 until about November 1, more than a month. The full committee considered the bill for 10 days, and while it was unanimously requested that the bill be published in the RECORD last Saturday night, in order that the country might know what it contained, the bill was not published in the RECORD and was only placed upon the desks of Members on Sunday.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ESCH. I tried to get the bill printed in the RECORD of Sunday morning, but I had only one copy, and that was used to have it printed in bill form.

Mr. SEARS. I am making no criticism at all of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ESCH. But I did get the bill printed in bill form, and had copies put in the post office on Sunday morning.

Mr. SEARS. I am simply stating the fact that it was not published in the RECORD, and the country did not know what the bill contained. On last Monday morning this House received for the first time the report issued by the members of the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is the most important piece of legislation that has been before this House or that will come before this House for consideration. Senator CUMMINS, a distinguished Republican, made the statement a few days ago in the Senate, and I heard him make it, that the President nine months ago called the attention of Congress to the fact that on the first of the year the railroads would be turned back to their private owners and demanded of the majority that they give due consideration to some bill that would properly regulate and control the return of the railroads. It is all right for us to take up the bill, but since last June, until last Monday, no such bill has been before this House for consideration, and although we have a good many Members present there are 435 Members of this House, and I know that they have not had a chance to study the hearings or the report on the bill, because I myself have not had the opportunity to give this bill the consideration that I would like to give to it. We have confidence in the members of the committee, but I want to call the attention of the House to the further fact that on the budget bill, to which there was no opposition, and which was carried unanimously, 12 hours of debate were given to the membership of this House. Those 12 hours could well have been spent in arguing this railroad bill. I simply state these facts, because I believe the country should realize and know that this bill is being "railroaded" through Congress to keep the pledge of the majority leader that some constructive measure would be passed before Congress adjourned, however half-baked it might be. I make the further assertion that the bill that we are now considering will not be the bill that will go upon the statute book, but that the Senate, giving it the careful consideration that they usually give to bills, will substitute their own bill, and that much of the Senate bill will be agreed to by the conferees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SEARS. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAYTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAUSES OF ACTION ARISING OUT OF FEDERAL CONTROL.

SEC. 204. Actions at law, suits in equity and proceedings in admiralty, based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use, or operation by the President of the railroad or system of transportation of any carrier (under the provisions of the Federal control act, or of such act of August 29, 1916) of such character as prior to Federal control could have been brought against any such carrier, may, after the termination of Federal control, be brought against such agent or agency as the President designates to adjust, settle, liquidate, and wind up matters arising out of Federal control. Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by State or Federal statutes and within two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court which but for Federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier.

Process may be served upon any agent or officer of the carrier operating such railroad or system of transportation, if such agent or officer is authorized by law to accept service of process in proceedings brought against such carrier and if a contract has been made with such carrier by or through the President for the conduct of litigation arising out of operation during Federal control. If no such contract has been made, process may be served upon such agents or officers as may be designated by or through the President. The agent designated by the President to adjust, settle, liquidate, and wind up matters arising out of Federal control, shall cause to be filed, upon the termination of Federal control, in the office of the clerk of each district court of the United States, a statement naming all carriers with whom he has contracted for the conduct of litigation arising out of operation during Federal control, and a like statement designating the agents or officers upon whom process may be served in actions, suits, and proceedings arising in respect to railroads or systems of transportation with the owner of which no such contract has been made; and such statements shall be supplemented from time to time, if additional contracts are made or other agents appointed.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LANHAM: Page 8, line 24, after the word "carrier," insert:

"Provided, That the period of Federal control shall not be computed as a part of the period of limitation in actions against carriers or in claims for reparation to the Interstate Commerce Commission for causes of action arising prior to Federal control."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, a provision somewhat similar to that proposed by this amendment was recently enacted in Senate bill 641, which was a bill to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control," and so forth.

The process of litigation has necessarily been in a somewhat chaotic state during the period of Federal control. Litigation has been held in abeyance, and litigants in many cases, ignorant of their rights, have failed to proceed, and it seems but a fair and just provision properly to safeguard their interests, to provide that the period of Federal control shall not be computed as a part of the period of limitation in causes of action arising before the Federal control began.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, is intended to take the period of Government control out of the running of the statute of limitations?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; it is.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In reading this paragraph and in conversation with the chairman of the committee, I find that the paragraph is intended to fix an absolute limitation of two years, and those two years would not begin until after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. LANHAM. That is to sue the agency which the President appoints in accordance with the provisions of the act, in cases in which the causes of action arose during Federal control, and this amendment is for matters arising prior to the operation of Federal control.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to prefer a request. I think this amendment would go better at the end of section 204, and I ask unanimous consent that it be offered at the end of line 22 on page 9, instead of at the end of line 24 on page 8.

Mr. LANHAM. That is agreeable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to transpose the amendment to the place indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, why is it not more appropriate at the place where it was offered, which deals with limitations of actions?

Mr. RAYBURN. It still applies to the same section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] a question. If I understand the statement made, this provision is to extend the statute of limitations as to claims existing prior to Government control?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Attached to this section, does the gentleman think it would have that effect?

Mr. RAYBURN. This is a new paragraph added to the section, and I think so.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as modified will be again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think this amendment as offered should be adopted. The reason is because during the period of Federal control these claimants had no right to levy on the carriers' property, and many claimants were confused as to just how action should be brought. I think the chairman of the committee agrees with me.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I will state that practically this provision was incorporated as an amendment in S. 641, restoring to the Interstate Commerce Commission its prewar powers, but that would only pertain to the small remainder of time under Federal control.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On page 8, line 21, it says "within two years from the date of the passage of this act." Is that intended to extend generally the period of limitation of two years in all States?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is a restrictive provision.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the gentlemen please, I want to offer an amendment which I think will make that clear.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to answer the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In my State the period of limitation is 12 months for a tort against corporations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The language is:

Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by State or Federal statutes and within two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court,

And so forth.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why not strike out "within the period of two years"?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say that that was put in at the very earnest request of the Railroad Administration—that these actions should all be brought at least within the period of two years, irrespective of the general statute of limitations that might obtain in different places, and it is only a restriction in case some statute should provide a period longer than two years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman fear that it means an enlargement of the period?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think not.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has a pending amendment, which will first be disposed of.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman strike out the word "provided" in his amendment?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word "provided."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 21, strike out the words "and within" and insert in lieu thereof the words "but not later than."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, as has been suggested, this language was intended to be a limitation on the right of action. I have been somewhat confused as to the wording of the paragraph as it is in the act. I think this suggestion of mine clears the matter up and makes it certain that without any regard to what the statute may be the right of action is limited to not later than two years from the termination of Federal control.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 22, after the amendment already adopted, insert:
"All actions, suits, or proceedings of the character above described pending at the termination of Federal control shall not abate by reason of such termination, but may be prosecuted to final judgment, substituting the agent or agency designated by the President to adjust, settle, liquidate, and wind up matters arising out of Federal control."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman offer his amendment to precede the amendment of the gentleman from Texas adopted a moment ago, making the amendment of the gentleman from Texas a separate paragraph?

Mr. JEFFERIS. I will accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska modifies his amendment so that it shall be inserted preceding the amendment of the gentleman from Texas just adopted, so that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be a separate paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield for a suggestion? I suggest that he eliminate from the amendment the word "all," the first word of his amendment.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I accept that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to so modify his amendment as to eliminate the word "all." Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think there are two or three other words in that amendment and in several other places in this section that ought to be eliminated. I refer to the words "and wind up." It seems to me that is inappropriate language in a bill of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. It sounds like winding up a clock.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Or a ball of yarn. I think they ought to be eliminated. I merely call this to the attention of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the elimination of the word "all"?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] does not apply to the amendment that I have offered. The reason for this amendment, as it appeared to me, was that section 204 had reference to the bringing of suits, whereas we know that there are a number of suits already pending against the railroads or the administrator in charge of them, and in order that their rights may be continued definitely and certainly I offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 14, after the word "States," insert "and of the several States."

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment for the purpose of putting the information as to whom it will be necessary to sue and serve within the reach of the bar of every trial court of the United States, so far as possible, the public generally, if the President should designate an agent or agents to close up the litigation that would be pending against any particular road arising out of Government operation and control. In my section one of the chief objections to the present bill has been that during Federal control it was very difficult to get promptly the rules and regulations of the Railroad Administration as same were passed and consequently were at a great handicap in trying to handle the business of our clients, often not knowing just how to proceed. This bill provides that amendments or additional contracts shall be filed or may be filed from time to time by the agent. In some sections of the country the district clerk is two or three hundred miles away from the United States district court, and I feel that it would not be an unreasonable thing to require that the agent file the information contemplated under this section of the bill not only with the clerk of the district court of the United States but also with the Clerk of the district courts of the several States in the Union or the trial courts having highest general jurisdiction.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. In many States there are no such courts as "district courts." Courts of the several States are known by all sorts of different names, and it seems to me that the gentleman's amendment might serve a purpose in those States where there is such a thing as a district court, but that in other jurisdictions, where there is not such a thing, it would not.

Mr. PARRISH. I would be glad to modify the amendment so as to say in the district courts of the several States or in the highest trial court of record in each county, and I will modify my amendment so as to cover that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I assume that the objection the gentleman has is that there are some States that do not constitute a district. That is, it takes more than one State for a district?

Mr. PARRISH. Oh, we have five districts in the State of Texas.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is it really the gentleman's purpose to have all of this information and data filed in each county?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes; that is our purpose. In some places we are some two or three hundred miles away from the clerk of the district court of the United States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think there would be no objection—and I do not pretend now to be speaking for the committee—if the purpose of the gentleman was just to require the Director General, or whoever winds up the affairs under Federal control, to file this data, in addition to the provisions of the act, with the highest court in the State; for instance, with the clerk of the supreme court in the State.

Mr. PARRISH. But that would not help any.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In fact, that would afford the same opportunity for the litigants to determine whom they should serve as is afforded in most States with reference to foreign corporations.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to say in reply to the gentleman that there are districts in our State that are larger than several of the States of the Union, and that the object of this amendment is to put this information as near as we can into the hands of the general public and of the lawyers of the bar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment. I think the view expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] is correct. There is this, among other practical reasons, in support of his view: If the statement is filed only in the Federal court or filed only in the highest court of the State, then it would be necessary for everyone who wishes to use the fact expressed in the statement to pay for a certificate of the statement, and undoubtedly this would involve expense, which would be particularly prejudicial to people who have small claims.

While I am on my feet I would like to refer to another point which I think should receive the attention of the committee. On page 9 the provision is that process may be served upon any agent or officer of the carrier operating such railroad or system of transportation "if such agent or officer is authorized by law to accept service of process in proceedings brought against such carriers."

There will be a great many cases in which there is no State law that authorizes the acceptance of process, and it strikes me that there should be substituted this simple provision: "Processes may be served upon a carrier owning or operating such railroad or system of transportation." Then leave it to the Federal or the State law, as the case may be, to determine how process shall be served. While I am up, there is one other feature I would like to mention. Going back to the first paragraph of section 204, there seems to be an omission there of any right to assert causes of action, accrued heretofore, arising from torts committed by or the loss and damage to property involved in the operation of vessels owned by the Government and conducting business upon inland waterways. Now, as I understand, while Federal control is in effect such a suit can be brought against the Director General pursuant to orders issued by him, but upon the cessation of Federal control no such suit will lie against anybody unless this act provides for it, and this particular bill does not provide for it. This paragraph provides for a suit against any carrier whose system of transportation has been taken over, but does not cover cases where the Government has bought vessels and put them in operation. In those cases there may be valid claims which can not be asserted unless authority is given by this bill. Here is apparently an omission which I respectfully suggest to the distinguished chairman of the committee that ought to be taken care of at some stage or other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas by calling attention to the situation in the western portion of Texas in reference to limiting it to the clerk of the Federal court. I think if you would make it the clerk of the district Federal court or courts of like general jurisdiction in the States it would fill a long-felt want for our people. While I am on the floor I want to ask the committee a few questions about section 204. As I understand, all these actions at law referred to here are such suits as personal injuries, suits on shipments, and matters of that kind which are now pending in various courts against the Railroad Administration. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Here is what I desire to ask the committee: Would it be possible, in behalf of the litigants, in behalf of the parties who have been injured by this corporation and who have brought suits against them and whose suits are transferred out of the general run of legislation, to transfer these suits by congressional enactment back from whence they come or from where they would have been had there not been Federal control? As I understand, this provision creates an agency to be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to adjust, settle, liquidate, and wind up matters arising out of Federal control. Now, then, this agency, as I understand it, to be appointed by the President for the purpose of adjusting, settling, and liquidating these matters, will not be the court in which the suits are brought, but will be a separate tribunal, and now I want to ask——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The agency will no doubt be some one like a director general—that is, the agency for winding up affairs.

Mr. BEE. That is the agency that is contemplated.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That will be the party defendant.

Mr. BEE. Then I understand the agent will be the party defendant substituted for the railroad administrator and will not be a separate agency set up, but the cases will continue in the court in which they were brought as originally instituted. Am I correct in that? Then may I ask the committee, Why do you not permit these suits brought by citizens against the railroad corporation temporarily under Government control when the Government control ceases to go back again as they were before Government control and let the litigants proceed in their own vicinage and before their own tribunals?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think rather than to have to answer specifically the questions the gentleman has asked I will state what this section provides as I understand it. This section deals in the first place with causes of action growing out of Federal control.

Mr. BEE. Torts?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Personal injuries?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Shippers' contracts?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Just the same as it was before Federal control?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. To be sure. Now, that will be part of the operating expenses; that application is part of the operating expenses.

Mr. BEE. Just like a receivership?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. Under Federal control the director general issued an order requiring all of these suits to be brought against him notwithstanding the provision in the Federal-control act. Now, then, the purpose of this section is to provide that these suits may be prosecuted, that the claims that have not yet been brought may be brought just the same——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Those causes of action which arise through Federal control are provided for in this section, and by an amendment pending actions are provided for, and this provides that a suit can be brought against the United States Government at any place in the country. It is a very liberal provision for suing the Government. The Government took over these railroads and operated them, and torts and contract obligations arose, and they are really actions against the Government, and in pursuance of that idea the director general provided that suits should be brought against him. This carries it on further and makes liberal provision that the United States may be sued in any jurisdiction of the land where he could have been sued.

Mr. BEE. Would it be feasible to insert in the law a provision directing the clerks of the various courts to transfer the suits thus directed against the Government back as against the owner?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I think that would be an entirely wrong procedure, because this is a part of the operating expenses. It is the Government's obligation in practically every instance. While the Government was operating these railroads a tort occurred, a carrier is not liable. The Government is liable, and that is the procedure which they have pursued. The director general would be sued and that would be paid out of the operating expenses.

Mr. BEE. Would it be the same as if you had a receivership proceeding, and the judgment recovered would be paid out of the receivership fund and not out of the general fund of the corporation?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They will not pay it out of the funds of the corporation. This will be a Government obligation and will be paid by the revenues that come in, or out of the revolving fund, or by appropriation.

Mr. BEE. And not by the general carrier?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. For information in reference to this procedure, now, as I understand it, the Government is authorized through the President to make a contract with any of the carriers he sees fit to do so, and have them paid under this legislation?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman, it is expected the Government will in the long run pay all the expense in case the litigation is unsuccessful, or the expenses of the investigation, in any event, that are usually paid a party in any case?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why did not the committee simply provide, in line with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] said, that these cases should be transferred directly against the original railroad company, but that the Government should pay whatever the cost or the expense might be?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It would be this situation: Suing the railroad company, they could get a verdict against the railroad company and the railroad company would not be liable under the law.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Where will the venue lie under this section? In the Federal court or a district court?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. A Federal court or a State court.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Or State court either?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You can sue the Government in a justice-of-peace court under this section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What is the purpose of having lines 3 and 4, on page 9, and requiring that the agent be such as is authorized to waive service of process? Could not those lines be cut out?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Wherever the Government could make an arrangement with the carrier we wanted the suit to be brought, so that they could serve the agent in the same way as if they did not have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. You provide that in the second part of this paragraph, but in the first part you require not only that the agent be an officer of the corporation, but you require that he shall be such agent or officer as the law permits to waive process. In our State a man can not waive process unless he is authorized by an act of the corporation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Where is the provision that says he shall waive process?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Lines 3 and 4, on page 9——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That says "accept service."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That term says "accept service"; not waive service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. "Accept service" is the same thing.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PARRISH. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment I offered just a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Will he state the modification?

Mr. PARRISH. On page 9, line 14, after the word "States," insert "and all nisi prius courts of the several States having the highest general jurisdiction."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. PARRISH: Page 9, line 14, after the word "States," insert "and all nisi prius courts of the several States having the highest general jurisdiction."

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the modification. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer that as a substitute for my amendment, if I may.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PARRISH: Page 9, line 14, after the word "States" insert "and of the several States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Did the gentleman ask leave to submit a substitute for his original amendment?

Mr. PARRISH. I did not ask that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Do you want to vote on the original amendment?

Mr. PARRISH. I left it as it is, as the gentleman objects to making a correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division on that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. PARRISH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to cover the suggestion I made a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In line 18, page 8, after the word "settle," insert the word "and"; and, after the word "liquidate," strike out the words "and wind up," so that it will read "adjust, settle, and liquidate matters arising out of Federal control." I do not care to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 8, line 18, after the word "settle," insert the word "and"; and, after the word "liquidate," strike out the words "and wind up."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, that would involve a change in several other parts of the bill. The attention of the committee was called to the use of those words "wind up" when we were considering the bill both in the subcommittee and in the full committee, and while some objection was made to the phrase because it may not have a legal standing, we retained it because it has a well-known meaning in the business and financial world, and no other two words could more clearly and fully express the thought of closing up than the words "wind up."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to follow the Lanham amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], previously adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT, to follow the amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 9, line 22, insert: "Provided, That hereafter no suit against a railroad company, brought in a State court of a State in which the cause of action arose, shall be removed to any court of the United States on the ground that the parties are citizens of different States, if the suit is brought in the county where the cause of action arose or is in the county where the defendant is served with process or the plaintiff resides."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this section deals with actions against the Federal Government. This proposed amendment deals with the question of removal of Federal causes of action, an entirely different subject matter, and the amendment is not at all germane to the general provisions of this section.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, except for the fact that the Lanham amendment has been adopted, I am not sure but that I should agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. If I understand his point of order, it is that it is not germane to this section. This section does deal with the causes of action arising out of Federal control, and I am prepared to concede that this amendment would not be germane to the section of the bill as reported by the committee. But an amendment has been adopted by the committee, offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], which goes outside this section. The Lanham amendment provided that the statute of limitations—that is, in cases generally, not with reference to Federal control cases, but any cause of action that existed on the part of any citizen, if I understood the Lanham amendment, prior to the time of Federal control, may now be tried—the statute of limitations being extended. In other words, the Lanham amendment goes entirely beyond the subject matter of the bill as reported by the committee, and I have proposed this as a proviso to be added to the Lanham amendment. For that reason I respectfully submit that it is in order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the amendment that has been added to the section changes the situation. There were some provisions in here generally with reference to limitations of action, and the other amendment may have been germane for that reason. That amendment dealt with the question of Federal control and excluded the period of Federal control, the very subject matter with which we were dealing, from the statute of limitations. But this has nothing to do with Federal control. There is not anything here with reference to Federal control. It is merely a separate and independent proposal, as follows—I call the particular attention of the Chair to it:

That no suit against a railroad company—

It does not matter whether it was under Federal control or had ever been tried under Federal control—brought in any State court in the State in which the cause of action arose shall be removed to any court of the United States on the ground that the parties belong to different States.

That goes to the general question of procedure and would revolutionize our laws with reference to procedure and the removal of causes of action. If we could suddenly thrust that question in here it would certainly bring a novel and important question out of this question of actions arising during Federal control.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the question of order.

Even if the position of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] were correct, even if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] does enlarge the scope of the bill, which I do not think is the case, still the amendment of the gentleman from Texas pertains merely to the question of limitation of actions. The question of removal of causes of action proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is in no sense germane to that proposition. Therefore, in either case the latter proposal is not germane and is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] offers an amendment which, in effect, provides that hereafter no suit against the Federal Government brought in State courts can be removed to United States courts on account of diversity of citizenship if the suit is brought in the county where the cause of action arose or within the county where the process was served and the plaintiff resides. That amendment is offered to a section of the bill dealing with causes of action arising out of Federal control. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] refers, was to the effect that the period of Federal control should not be considered as a part of the statute of limitations in actions against carriers or claims against the Interstate Commerce Commission for causes of action arising prior to that.

That amendment sought to eliminate the period during which carriers have been under Federal control from the statute of limitations against actions on claims. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, however, deals with an independent and entirely different subject, namely, the removal of causes of action from State courts to the United States courts on the ground of diversity of citizenship. The Chair thinks there is nothing in the language of the paragraph or section now under consideration which deals with the removal of causes of action in any way, nor is there anything in the section as thus far amended which would make an amendment of this sort germane. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 9, line 3, strike out all of lines 3 and 4.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the first part of this paragraph, which deals with causes of action arising during Federal control or operation, in order to secure the service of process upon any defendant it is necessary not only to find an agent or officer of that corporation but also to find an agent or officer who is authorized by law to accept service of process in proceedings brought against such carrier. Now, I think, the first part of the provision is wise, to wit, that service of process must be had on an agent or officer of the corporation, but in some of the States, at least, there is no agent or officer of any corporation who is authorized by law to accept service. In such States it would be impossible to secure service under the terms of this bill. There is no agent or officer of any corporation in the State of Texas who is authorized by law to accept service, unless he is authorized by his own corporation to accept service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. This does not mean that the agent must be authorized to waive the formalities of service, but he must be an agent whom the law says may be served.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is not the way it reads. If the gentleman will change it to read in that way, I will withdraw my amendment. It says that process may be served upon any agent or officer if such agent or officer is authorized by law to accept service. I want to call the particular attention of the chairman of the committee to that. I am sure it is not his intention to deprive anyone who has a just claim against a railway company of the right to sue. Yet, if such provisions are placed in the bill as to make service of process impossible in certain jurisdictions, that will be the effect of it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the gentleman think that to amend it in the way I now suggest would express his view—to make the paragraph read in this way:

Process may be served upon the carrier owning or operating such railroad or system of transportation—

And so forth.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Perhaps that would reach the same end, but I think it would be better to designate the agent or officer.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is that not the way in which a statute ordinarily prescribes the method of service of process?

Mr. JONES of Texas. In my State it provides that it shall be an agent or officer of the corporation. I do not think that makes any material difference.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. An important feature of the matter is that the right of service should not be confined to the carrier operating the railroad, but should be extended to the carrier owning as well as the carrier operating.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one. That is apart from my amendment, however.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think that point should be considered.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that might well be covered.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 9, line 1, after the word "upon," strike out the words "any agent or officer of," and the words "if such agent or officer is authorized by law to accept service of process in proceedings brought against such carrier and," and after the word "carrier," in line 3, insert the words "owning or," so that the paragraph will read "process may be served upon the carrier owning or operating such railroad or system of transportation."

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. DENISON. Has all debate on that amendment closed?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. DENISON. I should like to be heard on it, and for that purpose I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DENISON. Gentlemen, I think the purpose of that amendment is simply to comply with the State law. The gentleman from Texas states that in his State nobody is authorized to accept service on a railroad. I think the gentleman is mistaken, although you can not get service upon a railroad by serving a paper on a wiper or some employee of that kind. You have got to serve a recognized agent who is authorized to receive service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. We have in Texas a provision which designates the person upon whom service may be had, but that person is not authorized by law to accept service. You can serve any agent or officer of a corporation in Texas, but that officer can not accept service unless his corporation authorizes him to accept it.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I understand the amendment to mean. It means to limit the right to bring suit by service on those officers who are authorized by law to be served. That is what I understand it to mean.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The term "accept service" has been defined by nearly all courts to mean an agent who is authorized to sign an acceptance of service. "I hereby accept service in behalf of the railroad company." An officer in the State of South Carolina is not authorized to accept service, but the statute says that service on certain officers shall bind the corporation. The term "authorized to accept service" means limiting it to this officer to whom authority had been committed by the railroad company to accept service generally. There is only one officer authorized to do that, and that is the officer of a foreign corporation whose authority is filed with the secretary of state. This is the rule in many States, but not in all States.

Mr. DENISON. If the position of the gentleman from South Carolina is correct, then the proper way to get at it would be to substitute the words "to be served with process" instead of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEVENSON. Authorized by law to be served with process.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the meaning given by the gentleman from South Carolina, according to the law of his State, of "accept service" is precisely the meaning given to it in the State of Virginia.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the modification suggested.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I will offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 3, after the word "law," strike out the words "to accept service or" and insert in lieu thereof "to be served with."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, another reason why I find this bill impossible is found in the labor sections. These sections are confused, uncertain, and misleading. After considerable study I find them almost unintelligible. But gathering the best meaning I can out of them, I can not escape the conclusion that they are intended to give the railroad companies a chance to get at the funds of the labor organizations for any damages which may result on account of strikes.

I will not take up the time of the committee to discuss these provisions in detail. I object to them as a whole and to the details also. I object to the principle on which they are based, so there is no need to point out objections to details.

I can not understand why the committee presenting this bill should assume that it is necessary or proper to bring in a bill with labor sections, providing for a scheme of labor control, which did not exist before the Government took over the railroads. Why is it necessary now to hand back to the owners these railroads under different laws applicable to their employees from those under which the railroads were taken? What has happened since the Government assumed control of these roads that makes it necessary or proper that we should change the conditions of labor?

Some members of the committee seem to take credit because there is no clause in this bill providing for a jail sentence for a striking railroad employee. I want to say to the committee that the railroad employees find the provisions of this bill more offensive and more objectionable from their point of view than the antistrike provision of the Cummins bill. They would rather you would make a frank provision of law sending a man to jail for striking than to fix it so that the arm of the railroads may reach into the treasuries of the organizations of laboring men and strip them of the savings that they have been accumulating throughout the years. They realize full well that you can not imprison 2,000,000 railroad employees. They realize that you can not bring an indictment against a great multitude of people like that, for public sentiment would never tolerate it. But they know also that if it becomes merely a matter of financial considerations the railroads may be permitted to reach in and get their funds that they have laid up for a rainy day.

What has happened during the past two years? We have fought a successful war, which we said was for the purpose of promoting the cause of democracy, for making the world safe for common men, ameliorating the condition of the poor, the humble, the weak, and the oppressed. We have brought that war of idealism to a successful conclusion, and I am not amazed that we find men coming out of it unwilling to go back to the same harsh labor conditions that we had before the war. I would expect them to want better conditions, not worse.

What has happened during the two years of Government control to now justify a change in public policy toward the men who work for the railroads? They have been loyal. They supported the war with their blood and their earnings. They stood like a stone wall. They made their sacrifices upon the battle field and in their humble homes. They showed themselves patriotic and loyal Americans, both as soldiers in the field and as workmen in the shops. What have they done to excite suspicion or hostility? No just man can bring an accusation against them.

What, then, is the reason for discriminating against the railroad employees, for tying them hand and foot and turning them over to the railroads? Why should we now embark on a change of policy? Some may answer that it is because of the strike of the Boston policemen; but this is not a true answer. Policemen struck in Cincinnati, and yet no such coercive measures were then proposed. Policemen are public servants. Their situation is entirely different. Railroad employees when Government control is ended are employees of private interests. Besides that, the drastic antistrike provisions of this bill were proposed and urged long before the Boston strike.

Some may answer that it is on account of the steel strike. We have had steel strikes and great labor disturbances for many years in this country. Drastic laws against strikes did not follow, and, besides, the drastic antistrike provisions reflected in this bill were proposed long before the steel strike was heard of.

No; it is not because there have been recent strikes; it is not because of any misconduct of men who toil. No such excuse for the labor sections of this bill can be found. It is because a general drive is being made against labor all over this country. A nation-wide propaganda has been carried on by the employers ever since the armistice was signed, and even before that. The employers, nearly all of them, made fortunes out of the war. Millions of war profits are in their pockets, and with the added strength of these tainted millions they propose now to make a drive against labor, to crush labor, and to thwart its fair aspirations.

The workingmen of America fought the Great War upon the basis of idealism, with the hope in their hearts for better and higher lives to come out of victory. They hoped not to have to go back to the old struggle between employer and employee, the old struggle of strikes and contentions over wages and hours of labor. They hoped some new, more humane, and more enlightened way might be found for the settlement of labor complications. The leaven of this idealism touched the breast of nearly every worker. It inspired the deeds of valor of our soldiers on the fields of France. It has, indeed, caused new aspirations and kindled new hopes. These aspirations the hard-fisted employer would crush, these hopes he would destroy. The campaign is being made not merely against public employees like policemen, not merely against men connected with public utilities, like railroad employees, not merely against men working in the great basic industries like steel and coal. It is a campaign against common men—wage earners everywhere and in all grades.

The truth is that the employers and financial class and those affiliated with them, and their parasites and hangers-on, are frightened by conditions in Europe. They fear the workers. They dread the aspirations of the people toward nobler lives and things more worth while. They talk in their corners of "Bolshevism" and "anarchy" and look at each other with blanched faces. They see spooks in broad daylight, and shiver with fear when danger is far away. In their stupid terror they answer aspiration by seeking to crush it. Their remedy for the boiler strained to bursting is another weight on the safety valve. They would crush labor with an iron hand early and before it has had time to ferment. Their epithets of "red," "anarchist," and "agitator" are flung like stones, not only at workingmen who seek better wages but at any who may be bold enough to speak for them. It is the old story.

The exploiting classes, the employers and their kind, are unnecessarily alarmed. Laboring men are as good Americans as they are, love our institutions more than they do, and have a more intelligent understanding of what Americanism is. Disappointed though he may be to find that the employer holds to old notions and has failed to grasp the idealism of a new and better day, the worker will go back to his old task of fighting the battles of labor in the old orderly and lawful way. He will take up the struggle, if need be, where it was left off when he went to war. He will do this if the employer class will fight fair, if they will not resort to unjust means, if they do not drive him too hard, if they do not carry oppression too far. Let not the employer by his dominating influence, his prestige, wealth, and opportunity call the instrumentalities of government, the courts, executives, and legislatures, to aid him in crushing the reasonable hopes of labor. Let him not be so foolish as to overreach himself and for the sake of mere temporary advantage impair the confidence of the great mass of the people in their judges and governors and other public officers. It is only when the people believe that their Government is fair and just and is equally the government of rich and poor that they can and will support it.

I am hoping that the employers will forbear in their campaign against labor. I am hoping for a new vision for them. Their interests, as well as the public welfare and the safety of our Nation, require concessions, justice, humanity, and reasonableness in their dealings with labor and moderation in their demands for governmental interference in their disputes with their employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 14, after the word "States," insert "and of the nisi prius courts of the several States having highest general jurisdiction."

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this amendment as it now reads ought to be adopted. The reason for asking for the adoption of the amendment is that it will put this important information in the hands of practically every bar in the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why does the gentleman use the phrase "nisi prius," which, of course, we all understand, but which is not usually put into the statutes that are enacted. Why would not a provision for filing this statement with the clerks of the courts of general jurisdiction suffice instead of using the words "nisi prius courts of the highest general jurisdiction"? Courts of general jurisdiction are understood to be courts that have jurisdiction for trying actions of all sorts, and using the words "nisi prius" seems to be unnecessary.

Mr. PARRISH. I used the phrase because it referred particularly to trial courts—trial courts having the highest general jurisdiction.

Mr. BARKLEY. Any court of general jurisdiction is a trial court.

Mr. PARRISH. Yes. I have no objection to changing the wording, if the words are objectionable.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are not objectionable, but they seem unnecessary.

Mr. PARRISH. They mean the same thing as the gentleman would have them mean.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Would it meet the needs of the situation if it read—

Shall cause to be filed * * * in the office of the clerk of each district court of the United States and of the secretary of state of each State.

Mr. PARRISH. No; that would not meet the situation.

Mr. ESCH. You would find it there, and anybody by telegram or telephone could get the information sought.

Mr. PARRISH. In reply to the chairman of the committee, I would say that that is the very thing that we are seeking to avoid. We feel that this is a public business, a public undertaking, and it will only cost a very little additional expense on the part of the Railroad Administration to put this information into the hands of the bar of practically every court in the United States, whereas if you do not adopt the amendment I have offered you will force the bar and the public to send telegrams for certified copies, and since your bill provides that additional contracts may be filed the public would not have notice of the filing, and since in many instances the courts are many miles away it will work a particular hardship. The result would be that the public would have to expend thousands of dollars in telegrams, whereas the Railroad Administration or the agent that is in charge of closing up this business could have a few extra copies filed with the clerk of the trial courts of the various counties of the States, and the essential information would be put within the reach of the bar and the public. I believe that it would be a great saving and that it would put the information in the hands of the people generally, and would not require them to send for certified copies and to be continually sending telegrams to the clerk of the district court of the United States for information. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] with respect to the suggestion that he makes to lodge this information with the secretary of state of the individual States. Is it a fact that every State in the Union has a secretary of state?

Mr. ESCH. I had supposed that all did.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman will observe that by using the specific words "secretary of state" he might cause to be left out some States, which did not happen to have such an officer, just as the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] in its original form, would not have applied to the State of Virginia, because we have no district courts in Virginia.

Mr. ESCH. We have none in Wisconsin.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Whereas the language used by the gentleman from Texas is language that will apply to every State in the Union.

Mr. ESCH. Does the gentleman know of any State that has not a secretary of state?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Personally I do not.

Mr. ESCH. I was not aware of a single State that did not have a secretary of state.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But I see no reason why it is necessary that every State should have a functionary carrying this particular title.

Mr. ESCH. And I suppose a nisi prius court would be found in practically every county.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Those are general words that would be easily understood, and which would apply to every State in the Union.

Mr. ESCH. But it ought to be also understood that there are some four or five thousand counties in the United States, and this would involve large expenditures.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It would be merely a question of some additional copies. The administration would find it necessary to print the information required to be lodged with the clerks of the district courts of the United States. As soon as the type for this purpose is set up it would be a very small additional expense to have the necessary number of additional copies printed for lodgment with the clerks of the nisi prius courts of the several States.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Under the proposed amendment would it not require to be filed in every county in the Union all of the railroads which were appointed? For instance, a railroad appointed in Florida would under this amendment have to be filed in every county in Oregon, and so on, and I do not think that is what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If it is conceded that your suggestion is well taken, the amendment would simply cause this information to be made much more convenient for the litigants, the courts, and the general public at a very small additional expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, what has happened during the past two years that we should change our policy with reference to labor——

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman that he is not discussing an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is discussing another part of the bill which is not now before the House. He is not talking upon an amendment pending, and I object to the delay——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. DENISON. No; I am sorry——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to make a plea to the gentleman. Is not the gentleman, in the interest of fairness, willing to let somebody here say a word on behalf of these employees? We have not had any time in general debate; the committee got it all. Why not give at least a little time to somebody who wants to say something for them. That is nothing but fair. The gentleman sat here this morning and allowed labor to be attacked for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama is not discussing the amendment which he proposes. If the gentleman from Illinois insists upon his point of order, the Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama I always enjoy hearing him make a speech, and when we come to the labor question I will be glad to hear him as long as he wants, but I want to expedite the bill as much as I can and I make the point of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask the gentleman why he did not make the point of order when the Member was attacking labor?

Mr. DENISON. That was in general debate.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; it was under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH) there were—ayes 33, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PELL: Page 9, in the Lanham amendment, before the words "against carriers," insert "by or."

Mr. ESCH. So it will read——

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the amendment will read:

"That the period of Federal control shall not be computed as a part of the period of limitation in action by or against the carriers."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not offer an amendment to an amendment that has been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment has been agreed to, and it is now too late to amend it.

The Clerk read as follows:

REFUNDING OF CARRIER'S INDEBTEDNESS TO UNITED STATES.

SEC. 205. The indebtedness of any carrier corporation to the United States, existing at the termination of Federal control, incurred for additions or betterments made during Federal control or for advances made by the United States or incurred to pay off any carrier's indebtedness, and properly chargeable to capital account, shall, at the request of the carrier, be extended for a period of 10 years, or a shorter period, at the carrier's option, with interest at the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the "standard contract" on the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements, and upon the cost of road extensions to the property of such carrier made by such carrier with the approval or by order of the President while such property was under Federal control, which interest shall be payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July of each year. Such indebtedness shall be evidenced, if practicable, by the first mortgage bonds of the carrier; but, if this is impracticable, then in such practical form as shall be prescribed by the President.

Any other indebtedness of any carrier to the United States which may exist after settlement of accounts between the United States and the carrier shall be evidenced by notes payable on demand, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and secured by such practicable security as shall be prescribed by the President.

The President may, in his discretion, set off against any indebtedness of such carrier to the United States any sum due to the carrier from the United States, to such extent as set off is permitted currently under any contract now or hereafter made between such carrier and the United States, or, where no such contract exists, to such extent as such set off would be permitted by the terms of paragraph (b) of section 7 of the "standard contract" between the United States and the carriers relative to deductions from compensation. Such set off shall be made first upon the class of indebtedness fundable hereunder in notes payable on demand, any remainder to be applied on the class of indebtedness fundable hereunder for 10 years.

No such set off shall be made of any sum so due to the carrier unless there shall have been paid to the carrier such sums due it as shall have been necessary to enable such carrier to pay the charges as defined in paragraph (b) of section 7 of the "standard contract" and dividends at the regular rate of dividends paid during Federal control (such fixed charges having accrued and such dividends having been declared during the period of Federal control), and such sums as may be necessary to provide the carrier with working capital in amount not less than one month's operating expenses, or due on account of material and supplies not returned in kind. If the President and the various carriers, or any of them, have entered or shall enter into an agreement for funding, through the medium of car trust certificates, or otherwise, the indebtedness of any such carrier to the United States incurred for equipment ordered for the benefit of such carrier, such indebtedness so funded shall not be refundable under the foregoing provisions.

With respect to any bonds, notes, or other securities acquired under the provisions of this section or under the provisions of the Federal control act, the President shall have the right to make such arrangements for extension of the time of payment, or for the exchange of any of them for other securities, or partly for cash and partly for securities, as may be provided for in any agreement entered into by him or as may in his judgment seem desirable.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENISON: Page 9——

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment, simply to correct the text. On page 12, line 3, after——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know what the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is until it has been reported.

Mr. MERRITT. But he will not object to this. After the word "certificates," page 12, line 3, there are two commas, and I move to strike out one comma.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman thinks that serious enough to be disposed of before the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is disposed of, very well. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 3, strike out the second comma after the word "certificates."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Page 9, lines 24 and 25, and page 10, lines 1 to 25, inclusive, page 11, lines 1 to 25, inclusive, and page 12, lines 1 to 14, inclusive, strike out, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 205. As soon as practicable after the termination of Federal control the President shall ascertain the amount of the indebtedness of each carrier to the United States, incurred for additions and betterments made during Federal control and properly chargeable to capital account, which may exist at the termination of Federal control; and (2) the amount of the indebtedness of the United States to such carrier arising out of Federal control. The amounts so ascertained shall be set off against each other to the extent permitted under any contract now or hereafter made between such carrier and the United States in respect to the matters of Federal control, or, where no such contract exists, to the extent permitted under paragraph (b) of section 7 of the standard contract between the United States and the carriers relative to deductions from compensation.

"(b) Any remaining indebtedness of the carrier to the United States in respect to such additions and betterments shall, at the request of the carrier, be funded into not exceeding 10 equal parts, one of such parts to be payable annually, beginning at the expiration of five years after the termination of Federal control, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date of the funding, payable semi-annually, subject to the right of such carrier to pay, on any interest-payment day, the whole or any part of any such installment before it is due. Any carrier obtaining the funding of such indebtedness as aforesaid shall give, in the discretion of the President, such security, in such form and upon such terms, as he may prescribe.

"(c) Any other indebtedness of any such carrier to the United States which may exist after the settlement of accounts between the United States and the carrier shall be evidenced by notes payable on demand, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and secured by such collateral security as the President may deem it advisable to require.

"(d) With respect to any bonds, notes, or other securities acquired under the provisions of this section or under the provisions of the Federal control act, the President shall have the right to make such arrangements for extension of the time of payment or for the exchange of any of them for other securities, or partly for cash and partly for securities, as may be provided for in any agreement entered into by him or as may in his judgment seem desirable."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois strikes out the entire section and proposes a substitute section. Ordinarily a perfecting amendment to the original section would be in order prior to the submission of this amendment. Would the consideration of and the action upon this amendment as a whole be regarded as a waiver hereafter to the right to offer a perfecting amendment to the original section?

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment is agreed to, it would leave no opportunity. If it is rejected, it would leave an opportunity. If any gentleman has a perfecting amendment, the Chair would suggest that it be offered at the present time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the purpose of my inquiry, in order to put the Members on notice.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain briefly the meaning of this amendment, and in order to do so sufficiently, so that you can understand it, I would like to ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, I am very much interested in what the gentleman has got to say, but there is no other course for me to take except to object. I am sorry to do it, but there is no other way that I can do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes upon the amendment which he has offered. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object.

Mr. DENISON. I have offered this amendment, gentlemen, as a substitute. And as a preliminary statement I want to say that I do it with an apology, if that is necessary, to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT]. I voted to report the bill out in the form in which it is reported, but since then I have made a more careful investigation of the full meaning of this provision of the bill as compared with the meaning of the provision of the subcommittee bill, for which this provision was substituted, and I have become convinced that the provision of the subcommittee bill would be the wiser of the two and ought to be embodied in the bill. And therefore I feel it my duty to offer the original provision as a substitute for the refunding provision of the present bill.

Now, what I wanted to do was to explain the difference in the results of the two provisions. It is a question of refunding. The Government owes to certain of the railroads, particularly the wealthy ones, the most prosperous roads, several hundred millions of dollars on what is called the standard return, that the Government has not paid them, because they have not needed it. It still has this money and will have to pay it to them as soon as we turn the roads back to their owners, unless we allow the Government to offset it against what the railroads owe the Government. It amounts to several hundred million dollars. Now, the roads owe the Government an immense amount of money—$1,147,551,000. The question involved in the amendment is whether or not we are going to offset the amount that the Government owes to these railroads on standard return against the immense amount which the railroads owe the Government and which the Government has expended for additions and betterments.

Now, under the plan, as I started to explain under general debate, if this amendment that I have offered is accepted, the Railroad Administration—as far as can be estimated at this time—will have to come to Congress and get another appropriation of $171,020,000 to complete its work with the railroads. If the bill is passed as reported, Congress will have to make an appropriation of $363,355,000, and that will have to be done soon. Now, under the amendment I have offered the amount deducted from the total amount that has been expended for betterments and additions will be $415,016,000, whereas under the present provision of the bill there will only be $133,911,000 deducted. So that the substance of it will be that if the bill is passed as the committee has reported it, without this amendment, we will immediately have to make an additional appropriation to the Railroad Administration of at least $363,355,000. Now, that is in order that we may turn over to these railroads several hundred million dollars which the Government owes them, and we just let them take that amount and keep it, and then they can make notes to the Government for the millions which they owe to the Government. We have made such vast appropriations here that I do not think we ought to appropriate these other hundred millions in order that the railroads may get in cash what we owe them on standard return, when they merely give their notes to the Government for such an immense amount of money that they owe to the Government.

Now, the argument in favor of the other proposition is that we ought not to strip the railroads of the cash so that they will have nothing to operate on.

But the answer to that is that the Railroad Administration, the Government, owes a great deal of money on current accounts, several hundred million dollars, which it is going to pay for the railroads.

The Government will advance to all the railroads, the rich ones and the poor ones alike, an amount equal to one month's current revenues. That will give them all a working capital to begin with. Then the Government will pay all past-due bills as they are presented, and the railroads, for the first time in their history, will start out with a clean slate, not owing one dollar on current accounts. And I do not at all fear that their daily receipts, together with what the Government advances to them in cash, will not be sufficient to enable them to meet all their urgent obligations. If this should happen not to be the case the bill provides that they can apply to the Government for temporary loans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Chair will recognize next the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT], a member of the committee.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, of course, in five minutes——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I rise to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may have a little more time in which to explain his position.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may have additional time. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to allow me to make a motion?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I move that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may have five minutes more in which to finish his statement.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] be allowed to proceed for 15 minutes, or so much thereof as he desires to use. He is one of the chief exponents of this position, and he knows more about it, perhaps, than anybody else, and it is very important that Members on both sides of the House should have a full explanation of his views.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to know if it would not be in order and if it would not be entirely proper to pass over this section, with the amendment, until to-morrow or next day, when the Members of this House can know something about it? It seems to be a very important feature that nobody here seems to know anything about.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is well taken. It is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, of course with only five minutes at my disposal I can not go into a detailed explanation of section 205. It is, however, in my opinion, fundamental to the bill and to the successful return of the railroads to their owners. The reason why I think it is fundamental is that only under this section will the railroads be returned with the working capital which I think, under the existing contract, belongs to them.

You will be told that it is a mere casting up of accounts, a crediting of one against the other. But bear in mind when that is said to you that there are two very distinct classes of accounts between the roads and the Government, one being current account and the other being capital account. It has never been possible for any road, however prosperous, to pay for its permanent betterments out of the current account, and if the United States, having the power, should demand that from the roads, they still would not have proper working capital.

You will be told on that point that the Director General of Railroads proposes to leave in the treasuries of the roads sufficient working capital. But those who believe in this section think that while the effect in that particular might not be very different, it ought to be put in here as a matter of law and not as a matter of favor or chance on behalf of the director.

You will also be told that even if the roads should be stripped, as I believe they will be stripped, of their working capital, under the provisions of this bill the Government can loan them sufficient money for working capital. But obviously the distinction between the two is that they will have in the one case the money that I claim belongs to them, and they will have it for 10 years, whereas under the other provision, under the amendment, they will owe it on demand.

Now, it was said this morning that the object of the committee report was to get the roads away from the Government. The way to get the roads away from the Government is not to load them up with demand loans, so that if some official of the Government does not like what the roads are doing, or if he wants to coerce them, he can say, "Pay up those demand loans or do what we tell you." I do not think that would be fair or tend to good management.

Now, the roads do not ask that the Government shall not be allowed to set off whatever is due on current account. I can not read a whole tabulation of figures in the two or three minutes that remain to me, but I will say to you this, that under the plan of this bill there will be set off against the Government account over $550,000,000 which the roads owe the Government, and all that will be retained will be enough for their working capital and enough to meet their bond interest, their taxes, and other provisions which are in the standard contract. I say that aside from the policy of this thing, this bill in substance and in equity simply calls for the carrying out of the contract between the railroads and the Government and the fulfillment of the spirit of the railway control act.

Now, the notion that these roads are rich and do not need the money, and the idea that you have got to make them hustle, it seems to me, is not at all in accordance with the facts; because, as everybody admits, the credit of these roads has been injured, and they can not go into the market and get the money they need.

If we put these roads back we should do it on a proper basis and with a rate structure such that the public will know that the roads will not only start off with an adequate working capital, but also that their income will be large enough to give them credit, so they can get their new capital from the investing public.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before I begin I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 205.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, beginning with line 23, strike out all of section 205.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, section 205 as reported by the committee is simply this, that whatever the Government owes the railroad the Government must pay, but when the railroad owes the Government we must take their promissory note, with no security, no first mortgage, just take such security as the roads give us. That is all that section 205 means as it is presently written. We must pay the roads the last cent we owe them on the nail, dollar for dollar, but what they owe us, ah, that is a different question.

Now, the proposition the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] offers is what the subcommittee recommended. The Denison amendment should be adopted, because under its provisions the accounts are settled up at the end of Federal control, the Government and the railroads rendering their accounts and making a final and full settlement.

If you adopt section 205 as it stands, be prepared to vote hundreds of millions of dollars to wind up the Federal control act. If you adopt the Denison substitute, then you will only be giving to the railroads what the railroads ought to get and not a dollar more.

Never before in all the history of the world have ever I heard that in any settlement of open accounts one party to the settlement is not permitted to offer as compensation set-off to his debt what the other party owes unto him. I will say that the chairman of the committee [Mr. ESCH] and every member of the subcommittee was opposed to the Merritt amendment as it stands to-day in section 205, but they all supported the Denison amendment as it is offered, because that was the original proposition which was defeated in committee. Gentlemen, you can not get away from it. You can not pay the railroads what you owe them and then take their security or what they may be willing to give you for what they owe you. Make the settlement when Federal control is over. Make it complete. Let us pay them what we owe them, but in the name of the taxpayers of this country make them pay us what they owe us. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. If I have time.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to ask the gentleman if there is not this difference, that under the rate fixed by the President under the standard contract they pay less than 6 per cent, whereas under the other provision the railroads would pay 6 per cent? I would like to ask what is the rate fixed by the President in the standard contract? Is it not about 5 per cent?

Mr. WINSLOW. It has never been fixed.

Mr. HASTINGS. I had an impression that it was about 5 per cent.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have read from the desk this communication, dated yesterday, received just now by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee [Mr. ESCH], and subscribed to by Walker D. Hines, Director General of the Railroads. In this communication he has taken up very clearly and not too elaborately the very propositions involved in this discussion, the question of refunding and the interest question, which is far more involved and ramifying than anyone has set forth on this floor. I ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have read the communication referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how long will it take to read this communication?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, it is about three and a half pages long, but it is so material to this discussion that I hope no objection will be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
WASHINGTON, November 11, 1919.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ESCH: I would like to submit for the consideration of yourself and your associates the following comments and suggestions on certain features of H. R. 10453:

Section 205 makes provision for funding of carriers' indebtedness to the United States, and on page 10, lines 4 to 15, it is provided that the indebtednesses "shall, at the request of the carrier, be extended for a period of 10 years, or a shorter period, at the carrier's option, with interest at the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal-control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract on the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements, and upon the cost of road extensions to the property of such carrier made by such carrier with the approval or by order of the President while such property was under Federal control, which interest shall be payable semiannually on the first days of January and July of each year."

Section 4 of the Federal-control act provides, as follows:

"That the just compensation that may be determined as hereinbefore provided by agreement or that may be adjudicated by the Court of Claims shall be increased by an amount reckoned at a reasonable rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions and betterments, less retirements, and upon the cost of road extensions to the property of such carrier made by such carrier with the approval of or by order of the President while such property is under Federal control."

Paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract is as follows:

"Upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements in connection therewith, and upon the cost of road extensions, made to the property of the company during Federal control, the director general shall, from the completion of the work, pay the company a reasonable rate of interest, to be fixed by him on each occasion. In fixing such rate or rates he may take into account not merely the value of money but all pertinent facts and circumstances, whether the money used was derived from loans or otherwise, provided that to the extent that the money is advanced by the director general or is obtained by the company from loans or from the proceeds of securities the rate or rates shall be the same as that charged by the director general for loans to the company or to other companies of similar credit."

It will be observed that paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract contemplates two different rates of return dependent upon the question whether the money used was derived (1) from loans or from the proceeds of securities or from advances by the director general, and (2) or from other sources. In the event that the moneys were derived from the sources which I designate as (1) the rate of return which the director general is to fix is to be the same as that charged by the director general for loans to the company or to other companies of similar credit. Thus in this instance the rate is fixed and, as a matter of fact, it is thereby fixed at 6 per cent, because that is the rate which the director general has charged. In the event that moneys are derived from the sources which I designate as (2) it is recognized by the contract that other considerations may prevail. This distinction was deliberately made and for the purpose of permitting the director general to fix a substantially lower rate of return in cases where the moneys were not borrowed by the company than in cases where moneys were borrowed by the company.

There is danger that the language of section 205 may be construed as giving the carriers the right, in funding their indebtedness to the Government, to the substantially lower rate of interest which may be fixed by the director general in respect of expenditures by them which were made without their incurring any indebtedness at all. If the provision should be so construed, the result would be most unjust to the Government. The subject matter being dealt with is additions and betterments in cases where the carrier has incurred an indebtedness, and therefore the rate of interest to be fixed has no relation whatever to the entirely distinct class of cases where additions and betterments have been made without the incurring of any indebtedness. On the other hand, if the provision in section 205 be construed to mean merely that the rate of interest which the carrier shall pay the Government upon indebtedness for additions and betterments thus funded shall be the same as the director general has charged the companies for loans, then this simply means that the rate of interest is to be 6 per cent, and it would be far better to state the rate at 6 per cent than to run the risk of confusing the matter. Undoubtedly if the provision remains in the section as it stands the railroad companies will try to get their entire indebtedness for additions and betterments funded at the very low rate which it is contemplated the director general has the right to fix under the contract in cases where the additions and betterments have been made without the incurring of indebtedness. The two things are wholly unrelated and this result would be most unjust to the Government.

To my mind, there is no possible reason for associating these dissimilar things together so as to cause action in one case to control in the other. There should be fixed a definite rate of interest by the Congress which should be charged on the funded indebtedness of the roads to the Government. What this rate of interest should be is a matter about which men will quite properly entertain different views, but in that regard I desire to submit the following:

The Government has recently been borrowing money at a cost of 4¼ per cent, with tax-exemption privileges given to the lender of the money. I have been advised by Treasury officials that computing this tax-exemption value, money is now costing the Government of the United States between 5 per cent and 5½ per cent. It would seem, therefore, entirely unreasonable to ask of the taxpayers of America that they shall carry the burden of the railroads' indebtedness to the Government over a minimum period of 5 years and a maximum period of 10 years at rates of interest less than what the Government has to pay for money it needs. I think it is highly desirable that while a rate be not named which would be unduly burdensome, it should be sufficiently high to invite the railroads, through private financing with the public, to obtain moneys to repay the Government during or at the end of the period for which indebtedness is fundable. I desire, therefore, to suggest that the bill be amended by striking out all of the language on page 10, lines 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and the words "Federal control" in line 14, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "rate of 6 per cent per annum."

The bill also provides in this same section on page 11, lines 10, 11, 12, and 13, that the set-off which is permitted shall be first made upon the class of indebtedness fundable in notes payable on demand. The effect of this is to require the Government to recoup itself for indebtedness owed it against that immediately payable rather than against that which the bill permits to be funded over a 10-year period. I do not think this provision should be required. This is a matter of adjustment that will depend largely upon the facts in connection with each road, and it simply invites the railroads not to pay the Government as rapidly as their financial resources might permit.

I attach memorandum prepared by Mr. Sherley, Director of our Division of Finance, showing how this last-mentioned provision would work in the case of one of the most prosperous railroad companies in the country and one whose credit is so good that it will have no difficulty in paying its current indebtedness to the Government.

It is further to be noted than on page 11, lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and part of 25, deduction from indebtedness is prohibited unless sums have been paid to the carriers not only as provided in the standard contract, to take care of their fixed charges and regular dividends, but "such sums as may be necessary to provide the carrier with working capital in amount not less than one month's operating expenses, or due on account of material and supplies not returned in kind."

The effect of this is to reduce to very small figures the amount of indebtedness of the railroads which can be offset against indebtedness of the Government to the railroads. The provision will require practically the funding at the option of the railroads of nearly the gross amount of their indebtedness on capital account as well as quite a portion of other indebtedness. It has the further vice of not doing what presumably it is intended to accomplish and that is to provide all the railroads with a working capital. It would provide strong roads with moneys to be used as working capital irrespective of whether they needed it or not, but it would not help, save in a slight degree, many weak roads, and as to some weak roads it would not provide them with a dollar of working capital. The provision therefore is peculiarly objectionable in that it unnecessarily takes care of those who do not need help and does not help those needing it most. I suggest, therefore, that the bill as introduced be further amended by striking out, on page 11, line 21, beginning with the words "and such" down to and including the words "returned in kind," in line 25 of said page.

In this connection it must be borne in mind that as a practical matter after the end of Federal control it will be desirable for the railroad companies to pay the maturing current liabilities which the Government has incurred in the latter days of Federal control, just as the Government had to pay in the early part of Federal control the maturing liabilities of the railroad companies incurred during the latter period of private control. Under the standard contract, however, the railroad companies are under no obligation to pay these current liabilities unless the Government shall place moneys with them for that purpose. The result, therefore, is that as a practical matter the Government will have to place substantial amounts of money with the railroad companies, perhaps aggregating one month's operating expenses, in order to get the companies to pay the Government's current liabilities as they mature. But if the provision now under discussion remains in the bill the Government will be in the position of furnishing the railroad companies still an additional amount of money for their own purposes and which the companies will not be obligated to use to pay the Government's maturing obligations. This seems to me a wholly unnecessary and unduly liberal policy, to which I do not think the Government ought to be committed. As a practical matter, the companies will be able to use currently for their immediate necessities the cash placed with them by the Government for the payment of its maturing liabilities, because the cash will be steadily replenishing itself from the current returns of the company, and they can in that way regain from their own operations ample cash in ample time to pay the Government's bills as they mature. The provision, therefore, is unnecessary and makes what will in effect be a double provision for working capital for the railroad companies.

Under the conditions which must be provided by the Government the carriers will, without the provision here objected to, have a working capital sufficient to enable them to carry on their business like any other going concern which takes over its predecessor's assets and liabilities.

Sincerely, yours, WALKER D. HINES.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to what extent and in what respect the amendment suggested by him conforms to the suggestions in the letter just read from Mr. Hines?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question I will say that, as I understood the letter from Mr. Hines, the amendment that I have offered embodies the suggestions exactly. Mr. Hines has been out of the city and I have not had a chance to talk with him; but I have talked with our former colleague, Mr. Sherley, the director of finance of the Railroad Administration, who is an expert on such matters. The suggestions of Mr. Hines in his letter to Mr. ESCH are every one embodied exactly in the amendment which I have offered as a substitute for this provision of the bill. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. I think it is a matter of extreme importance. The trouble about the provision in the bill is, as pointed out by Mr. Hines, that it will unnecessarily allow working capital to the very prosperous roads, and it will not allow the necessary working capital to the poor roads. The proposition that I am making, and that is embodied in the substitute which I have offered, will allow the administration to turn over to all the roads, the poor and the rich alike, a month's current revenues as a working capital, and in the meantime the current revenues coming in will enable them to proceed without any difficulties. Then, if they should have difficulties, they can go to the administration and make temporary loans to tide them over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the gentleman's amendment agreeable to the committee?

Mr. DENISON. I am not authorized to speak for the committee. The amendment that I have offered is the provision of the original subcommittee bill, which was submitted to the whole committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that that met with the approval of the railroad administrator, Mr. Hines, at the time that was put into the subcommittee's bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the amendment. This is a very complicated question of bookkeeping. I could not undertake in detail to go over the entire transaction in five minutes, but I want in a very few minutes to state to the Committee of the Whole why I am in favor of the provisions of the bill rather than the Denison amendment. I said yesterday in general debate that the committee was confronted with the proposition as to whether we were going to the Government ownership and control of railroads or would return them to private ownership and control, a policy which has made this Nation the great, rich, prosperous, powerful Nation that it is. If I were to ask this committee how many members are in favor of Government ownership I would not get three hands, and if I were to ask who are opposed to it the remainder would hold up their hands. It is not enough to say that we are opposed to Government ownership unless we are willing to make private ownership and private operation of the transportation systems a success. This is a financial proposition. It is not a popular thing to argue in favor of something that is beneficial to the railroads, but I am not afraid in this crucial time to do that, for it is a matter of simple justice. We have to meet this proposition with courage, and we can not refuse to make the provisions which we know are necessary on the ground that we may be criticized because we are lending the money of the Government to the railroads of the country.

Personally, I do not want to put the railroads of this country into the money market immediately upon the termination of Federal control, and I do not think any Member of this House wants to do that, but the Railroad Administration has expended for capital expenditures, and that embraces a situation in the financial world which would have required the carriers to have gone into the market to get additional money in order to make those capital expenditures—the Government of the United States under its power made those expenditures—and reduced to its simple terms the question is, whether you are going to give a period of 10 years to these carriers to meet these obligations, which would have been in ordinary times long-term obligations, or whether we are going to make them pay now and send them into the market to raise large sums of money at the time of the termination of Federal control. For my part, although there may be some little benefits to some large railroads, it can not work exactly right in all cases. In such a comprehensive proposition of this kind you always can not do that, but so far as I am concerned I am willing to vote for this bill as it stands. These provisions are intended to be of some benefit to the railroads and at the same time be just to them. It does not give them a cent. This gives them a period of time within which they can meet these obligations which the Government has put upon them, irrespective of the desires of the carriers. And I appeal to you, if you want to see our great transportation system a success, to deal fairly with these carriers. Talk about the loan of a few million dollars when transportation of the right kind and of a high standard certainly exceeds in importance the few million dollars which they are permitted to refund! Do you remember what it cost when our transportation system failed, when Garfield stopped everything for a week? It cost this country over a billion dollars, and I appeal to you to look beyond the question of a mere few million dollars into its effect on the transportation needs of this country and let us start these carriers——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana is making a very intelligent argument, and I would ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to speak for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, providing I be allowed five minutes in which to reply to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I object unless—Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for 10 minutes, 5 minutes of which is to be occupied by myself.

Mr. DENISON. I do not care for more than three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have five additional minutes and that he have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this matter is not proceeding on any limit of time; there may be some others who desire to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, now to recur for a moment to the argument made here that all the subcommittee were against this proposition, we have been discussing things that happened in the committee, and I want to refer——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. All right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with the gentleman. Now, why will not your proposition benefit the less prosperous roads as well as the prosperous roads?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I wanted to bring that out.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Now, I want to deal with this argument, because I believe——

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not desire to yield now. I wish to deal with the argument that the subcommittee were all in favor of its provisions substantially as this amendment provides, at least they were not in favor of the bill as it was finally written. It is true; but do you know what that means? That means that the provisions that were originally brought in were so unjust from the standpoint of the transportation needs of the system that, notwithstanding the five votes they had to start on, the other members of the committee were able to outvote them. I really ought not to argue the question of what happened in the committee, and I only did so because of the fact it was mentioned.

But it is one plain, simple proposition, gentlemen. You can juggle statistics around and talk about weak roads and strong roads all you want to, but if this amendment goes through it means that the carriers of this country will be forced to go into the market immediately upon the termination of Federal control and obtain money with which to do this refunding. We spent a great deal of money in this war time. The Railroad Administration has cost us money by deficits, and I do not say that in a spirit of criticism, because it was not a question of money-making; but now it is more important in this reconstruction period to temporarily—not to not give them anything—but temporarily to allow them to refund this amount, and in order to show a liberal spirit, so that the great transportation systems of this country may be a success and the country may have the prosperity that will necessarily follow such a success. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I will even consume the five minutes. The proposition before us has been fairly stated by two or three members of the committee and emphasized by the letter from the director general to Mr. ESCH. By the proposition now in the bill you propose to allow the railroads to use about $250,000,000 of the money of the taxpayers for a period extending over 10 years. Under the Denison amendment you will require a set-off of accounts. Now, in justification of the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT], which is contained in the bill, he and the gentleman from Indiana, who has just closed his address, holds up to you the danger of the railroads going into the market to borrow money at this time. Ordinarily there would be some justification for that argument, but when you by this bill provide a guaranty for six months to the railroads, based upon the earnings during the test period, you send them into the financial markets, not with a chance but with a certainty, and with the further certainty that if necessary they can borrow from Uncle Sam to the extent of $250,000,000. What banker would hesitate to lend to the railroads when he knew that the railroads had a guaranteed income, and in addition could borrow to the extent of $250,000,000 from the Government? And the only question is whether you are going to adopt the course urged by these gentlemen and force the Government to pay all of its debt to the railroads and allow them to settle their debts to the Government with a promissory note, or whether you will require a set-off, and then let them go into the financial markets with a guaranteed compensation behind them; the right to borrow $250,000,000, and——

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is bearing in mind the further fact, that under the guaranty provision it was possible from the very beginning to ask for an advance if they needed it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes. I know they have a right to ask for an increased rate, and with that right, with a guaranty, and the loan, when they lay their cards on the table of any banker in this country, a loan is assured them, and there is no justification for fearing they will not have credit. I hope the committee will adopt the Denison amendment, and complete the settlement of accounts between the Government and the railroads. This should be done even if it necessitated their borrowing part of the $250,000,000 the very next day. If you do not, these accounts will remain open for years and years. It will cost the taxpayers more money than is indicated in this amendment, and we can never justify our action.

Mr. WINSLOW. Have you in mind also that under the guaranty arrangement the roads can apply for an advance of money on the guranty account during the first two months——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes. They can apply for it in the first two months, and they will have no trouble in financing themselves. Again, as pointed out in the letter of the director general, this mandatory provision will force the Railroad Administration to allow the prosperous roads to fund their debt, and at the same time will not enable them to assist the road that most needs assistance. The Denison amendment covers all of the objections cited by the director general and expresses the views of the subcommittee in charge of the framing of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Congress, those of us who are not on the committee are laboring, of course, at a great disadvantage in considering this bill. What ought to be done with this measure at this stage upon such an important part of it is for this committee to rise and let these amendments be printed, together with a letter of Mr. Hines, so that we may read them in the RECORD and digest them, and come here with an intelligent purpose to act according to what is right. [Applause.]

This is, indeed, an important part of this bill, and I would like to read an excerpt from a letter sent to me by a very dear friend of mine in the city of Philadelphia who is familiar with railroad matters, and is the representative of one of the largest railroads in this country and one of the best railroads in the world. I refer to the Pennsylvania Railroad, which may well be classed as one of the "strong roads" that you were talking about that would get such advantages and benefits. Let me read you what he says, and I vouch for him as a man of integrity, truthfulness, and high character. I read:

MY DEAR MR. GRAHAM: I am inclosing a memorandum which emphasizes the importance of retaining the provisions of section 5 of the Esch bill as reported to the House, which section deals with the refunding of indebtedness of the railroad companies to the Government of moneys expended during Federal control for additions and betterments.

As you will see from the memorandum which I inclose, the indebtedness of the Pennsylvania Railroad system alone to the Government on this item approximates $100,000,000 and over, and you can imagine what it will be when you combine the figures for all the railroads in the United States.

If the railroads are called on to commence at once making these repayments, even though limited to 10 annual installments, it would be a heavy drain upon the resources of the companies, and interfere substantially with their ability to secure new capital for the purpose of making annual improvements in the future, which improvements are so sadly needed on all the railroads. The Pennsylvania Railroad ought to spend over $50,000,000 each year for improvements.

Furthermore, the railroads will have another very serious drain on their resources and credit, and that is in their necessity for obtaining new capital to refund existing capital obligations which fall due in the near future. For example, the Pennsylvania Railroad system will need over $26,000,000 in 1920 and over $79,000,000 in 1921 in order to take care of maturing obligations.

It is of vital importance to the interests of this country that everything shall be done to strengthen railroad credit, and any proposition looking to a return to the Government of the amounts owed the Government by the railroads at any period less than 10 years will have a very serious effect upon railroad credit.

Indeed, it is my judgment that the public interests require that the repayment of amounts due the Government for capital expenditures should be extended to at least 15 years.

I want to ask you, fellow Members of Congress, to remember this: When the distinguished gentleman said, "This is a settlement of accounts," as though he was going to treat it as a commercial transaction, I say to him that his analogy is baseless and wrong. The Government seized this property. The Government spent what money it chose upon this property, sometimes with the disapproval of the governing body, the owners of these properties. The Government spent this money, and now shall we say, "Come up to the captain's desk and settle," as if this was an ordinary commercial transaction?

No. When the Government put forth its strong arm and took for the necessities of war the property of private ownership, it ought to deal generously, fairly, and manfully in making its settlement. It ought to grant the extension that this amendment as offered would kill, namely, making this a 10-year period for the payment back for the capital charged against the roads, not for the current operating expense but the capital expenses. They say, "Do not make us pay them back, one-tenth each year, but let us pay them at the end of 10 years, so that we may take our own property back again, put it on its feet, serve the public, and help to make it the great road which it was before." And in all its history it has been serving faithfully and generously every interest in the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. ELLIOTT, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6951. An act authorizing the return to the sender or the forwarding of undelivered second, third, and fourth class mail matter; and

H. R. 3143. An act to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1229. An act to amend an act approved August 22, 1914, entitled "An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MARTIN, to be held in Charlottesville, Va.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the President pro tempore had appointed Messrs. DEATH OF SENATOR MARTIN, OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I am compelled to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk in reference to the death of Senator MARTIN. He represented the State of Virginia in the upper body of Congress for nearly 25 years, a longer period than any other Senator ever represented the Old Dominion. During that time he was for many years the leader of the Democratic Party, first when the party was in the minority and afterwards when it was the majority party. He has left his impress upon the history of legislation of this country as few men have who have served in Congress.

At a later date, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the House to set aside a day to pay proper tribute of respect to the distinguished Senator.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 387.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN, a Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Messrs. FLOOD, MONTAGUE, SLEMP, SAUNDERS of Virginia, MOORE of Virginia, HARRISON, BLAND of Virginia, HOLLAND, WATSON of Virginia, WOODS of Virginia, CANNON, CRAMTON, SISSON, KITCHIN, WHALEY, BOWERS, WINGO, and BYRNS of Tennessee.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, November 13, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.

THURSDAY, November 13, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we gather together this morning with a sense of a great loss in the death of one of the Members of the Senate. Ripened by experience and age, he has given his wise counsel and leadership to his country, and through qualities of heart and spirit he has attracted all men, unifying our efforts and leading in constructive paths for the establishment of the great ideals of our national life. With reverence for the God of his fathers and with a high sense of the dignity and glory of human life, he has given himself to God and to humanity.

We thank Thee that he was a man of prayer, a man of conscience, a man of human friendship. We pray that his influence may abide with and guide us who follow in the discharge of the great duties of this day, that we may measure to the expectation of God and to the hope of the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, November 10, 1919, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

RAILROAD-STRIKE LEGISLATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in a recent, possibly the last, issue of the Wall Street Journal there appeared an editorial, and I read the opening sentence:

> As many competent observers of Washington affairs have been predicting, Senator CUMMINS has had to pigeonhole his plan to make railroad strikes punishable by fine and imprisonment.

That statement is an unqualified falsehood. There is not the least semblance of truth in it. I do not say that the person who wrote it knew it to be false, but I do say that the very slightest inquiry upon his part would have enabled him to know that it is false.

In so far as I am concerned there has not been the least wavering or hesitation with respect to the labor provisions in the railroad bill. I believe that every member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce who voted for those provisions in the committee is earnestly in favor of incorporating them in the legislation which we shall adopt. I further believe that a very large majority of the Senate is in favor of the provisions which we have reported from the committee.

Reflection serves only to intensify my conviction that the committee has proposed the true and the only solution of the problem which now disturbs not only the peace of our own country but the peace of the world, and which threatens at this moment to overturn the institutions in which we have so deep and abiding confidence. It is a gross misapprehension and misrepresentation to characterize these provisions of the bill as an attack upon labor. It is not. On the contrary, the provisions are, in my opinion, a tower of strength for labor. They will protect the wageworker and obtain for him justice to a degree which the experience of mankind shows he can not reach through the strike. Moreover, they insure a tranquillity in the commerce of the country, and they establish a protection for the great body of the people absolutely necessary to their welfare and their prosperity, for regularity and continuity in the transportation of the United States are essential to the health, the lives, and the interests of the great body of American citizenship.

Not only has there been no hesitation, so far as I am concerned, with respect to these provisions of the railroad bill, but I intend, when the measure comes before the Senate, to propose an extension of the principles of the bill, which are now applied only to transportation, to the basic industries of America, to the production of fuel, of iron and steel, to the production of foodstuffs, and of lumber and of building material and of clothing; for I can not conceive that the people of this country are to be continuously at the mercy of any class so far as these fundamentals in American life are concerned.

I have said so much, Mr. President, because I did not want any misunderstanding to prevail with regard to this subject. That leads me to say one more word. I hope that Senators will perceive the importance of reaching a consideration of the railroad bill at the earliest possible moment. There is no question so vital to the American people just now as the settlement in some fairly permanent way of the chaos which now exists in transportation. Here we are, and have been for four or five months, endeavoring to ascertain whether we are fit to enter a society of nations for the preservation of the peace of the world and have not yet demonstrated whether we are fit to ordain a system that will maintain peace in our own country in these essential respects.

I can not quite understand how Senators can consume as much time as they have been consuming in the consideration of the German peace treaty when this measure confronts them, when they know that we must before long legislate in some reasonable and practical way or see our transportation system fall into a disorder from which it will take years to rescue it. I am appealing to Senators to bear this matter in mind as they proceed with debate upon the German peace treaty, and, frankly, I must be permitted to say that, in so far as I am concerned, I am unwilling much longer to bear the responsibility of delaying the consideration of the railroad bill. If the German peace treaty is not speedily disposed of—and I do not underrate its vast importance; I realize that as fully as any Senator can—if it becomes obvious that we are not to dispose in some way of the treaty very soon, I shall feel it my duty to transfer to the Senate the responsibility under which I am resting and to ask the Senate to determine whether it will or will not proceed to the consideration of this overwhelmingly important legislation.

I am not saying this in the nature of a criticism; I understand the situation; but, in view of all the circumstances, I shall be compelled to ask the Senate very soon to decide whether it is more important to proceed with debate upon the German peace treaty or proceed to the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. McCUMBER subsequently said:

Mr. President, I have received a telegram from my State this morning which I desire to present as in legislative session. I think the telegram ought to have been presented at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] this morning relative to the provisions of the railroad bill.

There is now at the head of the Great Lakes only an amount of coal which is 500,000 tons short of the normal demand at this season of the year. As is shown by this telegram, there are two-thirds of the State of North Dakota to-day covered with snow which is about 2 feet deep. We have only coal enough to last for a very short time; and I can appreciate what the condition would be if we allowed the brotherhoods of engineers and firemen to tie up the transportation system of the country at this time. I think this condition supports the declaration made by the Senator from Iowa, and I ask that the telegram may be read in order that it may go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

WILTON, N. DAK., November 12, 1919.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are in desperate condition here on fuel. Situation held up by strike. Our property in danger of being taken over by State. Henry Drennan, president of district No. 27, United Mine Workers of America, has not issued release to miners. He is in consultation with Gov. Frazier to-day. State in terrible shape. Deep snow and severe weather. No stock of fuel on hand at any station. Will you take this up with proper authorities and act quickly? The situation is desperate.

W. P. MACOMBER.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 1st ultimo, certain information relative to the cooperation and coordination between the Interstate Commerce Commission and other agencies of the Government for promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Putnam Council, No. 137, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Newark; and of sundry citizens of Jersey City, Englewood, Morristown, Summit, South Amboy, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations covenant without certain reservations are adopted, which were ordered to lie on the table.

ELLEN M. WILLEY.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2707) for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 305) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3419) for the relief of estate of Benjamin Fenton, late surviving partner of Fenton & Co. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3420) to provide for payment to an officer, enlisted man, female nurse, or civilian employee of the American Expeditionary Forces of loss sustained on a negotiable instrument by reason of a fluctuation in the rate of exchange, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3424) to establish a national reserve force and to provide for the military and physical training and for the reorganization of the National Guard, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the people in many of the States feel that many of the great questions at issue have been determined by the legislatures of the States without an opportunity for popular expression and for properly obtaining the sentiment of the people in the States. I send to the desk a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the ratification of constitutional amendments by popular vote of the States, and I ask that it be referred to the proper committee, expressing the hope that the committee will give it prompt consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 126) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be printed showing the amendments of the House numbered.

ENFORCEMENT OF LEVER ACT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, last Monday I offered a resolution calling upon the Department of Justice for certain information regarding the attitude of that department under the Lever Act, my resolution having been prompted by the statement issued on that day by the American Federation of Labor. This morning I received this letter from the Attorney General relating to that subject:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 12, 1919.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: Your letter of the 11th has been received. I have had a most careful search made of the records of the department, and am unable to find any record of an opinion or commitment by this department that the provisions of the Lever food-control act would not be used to restrain labor unions from restricting production. I can confidently assure you that no such opinion or commitment appears of record, nor is there any correspondence which indicates that it was ever under consideration.

Yours, very truly,

A. MITCHELL PALMER,
Attorney General.

Yesterday the New York Times published this statement from a former Attorney General, Mr. Gregory:

GREGORY DENIES PROMISE—NEVER AGREED TO EXCEPT LABOR FROM LEVER ACT, HE DECLARES.

Former Attorney General Gregory denied in a statement here to-day that he had given assurances to labor leaders that the Lever Act would not be enforced against their organizations in attempts to better working conditions, as asserted by officers of the American Federation of Labor.

"While Attorney General I did not at any time give assurances to anyone that any law would not be enforced against any class of citizens," he said. "I gave no assurances that the Government would not seek to enforce the Lever Act against workers."

Inasmuch as these two communications fully answer the purpose which I had in view when offering the resolution on last Monday, I ask leave to withdraw the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted to withdraw the resolution.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Attorney General Palmer with reference to the coal strike.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAW WILL BE ENFORCED, MR. PALMER DECLARES—"COAL STRIKE PLAIN VIOLATION," HE SAYS IN STATEMENT CONSTRUED AS REPLY TO AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

"The Attorney General has issued the following statement, which is construed as a reply to the position of organized labor as set forth by the American Federation of Labor's executive council:

"'The coal strike is a plain violation of a Federal statute. This has been the Government's position from the start. The President declared it to be unlawful, and the court, after full hearing, has now declared it to be unlawful.

"'All I can say is that the law will be enforced. This same law has been enforced many times, and the Department of Justice has other cases now pending which were brought under it. The merits of the controversy between the operators and the miners are not involved in the court proceedings at Indianapolis, neither is the right to strike. Nothing that the Government has done is intended or designed to have any effect upon the recognized right of labor to organize, to bargain collectively through its unions, and under ordinary industrial conditions to walk out by concerted action.

"'The proposal by the President of a peaceful settlement of the matters at issue between the operators and the miners through negotiation or arbitration was rejected, and the Government therefore faced the alternative of submitting to the demands of a single group, to the irreparable injury of the whole people, or of challenging the assertion by that group of power greater than that of the Government itself.

"'Confronted with such a choice, the Government's duty was perfectly clear; it refused to surrender to the dictation of a group, and it proposes to assert its power to protect itself and the people, whom it is designed to serve. The Government is no respecter of persons in the enforcement of the law. Those who conceive that the resolutions of a convention or the orders of the officers of any organization in the country, whether labor organizations or any other, are superior in authority to the law of the land will find themselves mistaken.

"'I assume that the order of the court will be obeyed. The President's offer for a peaceful settlement is still open, and I hope that the miners and operators will now get together and settle their controversy.'"

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that bills of the following numbers and titles, having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, have become laws without his approval:

Presented October 28, 1919:

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Amherst W. Barber;

S. 2250. An act providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam;

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.; and

S. 3190. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.

ZION NATIONAL PARK—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following report:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Under which name the aforesaid national park shall be maintained by allotment of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the national monuments, until such time as an independent appropriation is made therefor by Congress"; and the House agree to the same.

The report was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH, TELEPHONE, AND CABLE PROPERTIES (S. DOC. NO. 152).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to repeal the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and to provide just compensation therefor,' approved July 16, 1918, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, I am transmitting herewith a report made by Albert S. Burleson, Postmaster General of the United States, giving a detailed account and report as far as it is possible to do so at this time of all acts and proceedings in connection with the supervision, possession, control, and operation of the telephone, telegraph, and marine cable systems of the United States, and of all moneys received and expended, and all property and assets acquired or held, and all liabilities or obligations incurred, including contracts relative to compensation awards.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
13 November, 1919.

CLOTURE RULE AND THE TREATY.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Following the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], this seems to be a good time to present a motion under the second paragraph of Rule XXII, signed by more than 16 of the Senators, providing for the close of debate. I send it to the desk as the motion of the Senators named and ask, if there is no objection, that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

We, the undersigned, in accordance with the provisions of the second paragraph of Rule XXII, move that debate upon the pending conditions and reservations proposed by Senator LODGE to be added to, and incorporated in, the resolution of ratification of the treaty with Germany, and all substitutes, amendments, and additions thereto proposed, be brought to a close.

G. M. HITCHCOCK.
KEY PITTMAN.
J. F. NUGENT.
T. J. WALSH.
ROBERT F. OWEN.
C. S. THOMAS.
JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.
C. B. HENDERSON.
C. A. SWANSON.
KENNETH MCKELLAR.
E. D. SMITH.
JOS. E. RANSDELL.
EDWARD J. GAY.
A. A. JONES.
J. O. WOLCOTT.
ED. S. JOHNSON.
O. W. UNDERWOOD.
N. B. DIAL.
JOHN B. KENDRICK.
W. F. KIRBY.
PETER G. GERRY.
MORRIS SHEPPARD.
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska be kind enough to give the number of the rule under which he is acting?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is Rule XXII.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry. Is it the purpose of the motion, the language of which I have just heard, that all debate shall be closed upon the treaty and upon all amendments or reservations that are offered, or simply to close the debate upon what are known as the Lodge reservations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri ask that question as a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. REED. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I am asking him that question because I want to know what the purpose is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this is the first time action has been invoked under the rule; it is the first time a step has been taken to put the rule into effect. The rule provides for cloture upon the "pending measure," and there might be some question as to what is the pending measure. A treaty can hardly be considered a "pending measure," in my opinion. Something over a week ago the Senator from Massachusetts proposed a measure in Committee of the Whole consisting of a number of proposed reservations and conditions which he had read to the Senate and which he proposed to incorporate in the resolution of ratification. The resolution of ratification is not before the Senate and can not be brought before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; but those reservations and conditions constitute a pending measure which the Senator from Massachusetts has presented and the adoption of which he has moved. The motion, therefore, as presented by the Senators who have signed it asks for the application of the cloture rule to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, together with all amendments, substitutes, and conditions thereto that have been or may be proposed.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I ask permission to interrupt him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. REED. But it would not cover, as I understand the Senator, any other reservation which might be offered or any amendment which might be offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it was intended to cover not only amendments and substitutes, but additions to these proposed reservations.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the rule itself provide what such a motion shall cover?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It provides that it shall cover the measure and all amendments and substitutes or additions, as I understand.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the rule be read, so that the Senate may know just what it does cover.

Mr. REED. I think I am familiar with the language of the rule.

Mr. LODGE. I have the rule here, if I may read it.

Mr. REED. The question that still recurs is this, What is the pending measure?

Mr. LODGE. I have here the language of the rule, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to read it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts to read the rule.

Mr. LODGE. The rule is as follows:

> If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll; and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate, by an aye-and-nay vote, the question:
> "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"
> And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.
> Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak, in all, more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decisions of the Presiding Officer shall be decided without debate.

It covers the pending measure, and the only pending measure before us is the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was about to ask the Senator, no matter how we shall arrive at amendments and reservations, if, after all, the pending question is not the treaty of peace with Germany, and that being the pending question and the only question before the Senate—the mere matter of the resolution and of what shall go into the resolution being simply the method by which we amend the treaty or make reservations concerning the treaty—will not the cloture rule apply to the treaty itself as the pending proposition before the Senate? I think it should.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course that is a question which must ultimately be decided by the Chair, subject to the support of the Senate, and can not be decided now; but my judgment is that the treaty is not a measure. We are not enacting the treaty. What we are doing is deciding whether we will ratify the treaty, and the measure that is before the Senate is the resolution of ratification.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, according to the Senator's construction, when we get through with the reservations, and while we have applied the cloture rule to those reservations, when we get into the treaty to consider it further in connection with the resolution for ratification we can discuss it ad infinitum?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. My judgment is——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. I will make a point of order instead of a parliamentary inquiry. I make the point of order that this proposed motion is out of order because it does not apply to the pending measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The rule makes it the duty of the Chair to announce that the motion has been filed, and it will be the duty of the Chair on Saturday, one hour after the meeting of the Senate, to lay the motion before the Senate for disposition. Debate is not in order at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does the Chair rule that the motion is out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not intend so to suggest. The motion is in order. The motion is filed, and the rule makes it the duty of the Chair to state the motion; and then it lies over until Saturday, one hour after the Senate convenes, and then it is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, another parliamentary inquiry. If the motion shows on its face that it is not in order, is it not proper to make the point of order now, so that no proceedings may be had under it if it is held to be illegal?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion is not in order, it would be in order for the Senator from Nebraska to raise the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order on the ground that the rule provides for no such motion as has been presented. It is purely camouflage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will examine it. He has not hitherto examined it. [A pause.] The Chair is inclined to hold that the point of order made by the junior Senator from Nebraska is well taken; but before doing so, the Chair will hear any suggestions which the senior Senator from Nebraska may have to make with regard to it. It does not seem to the Chair to be in the form required by the rule.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the difficulty of applying this rule under the circumstances is obvious; and in my opinion this is not the time to pass upon the question of whether or not this particular motion is in order. It is filed at the present time, and before it is voted on an objection may be made to it; but I will state to the Chair that so far as I can see we in the Senate are going to vote upon the Lodge reservations, and later the Lodge resolution of ratification. That is what we vote on. We do not vote on the treaty, and therefore it can not be applied to the treaty. It must be applied to the thing that we vote on, and the thing that we vote on is the resolution of ratification.

Now, it is true that the resolution of ratification is not in the Committee of the Whole, and is not in order at this time; but the reservations which are to go into the resolution of ratification are in the Committee of the Whole, and they constitute the question that is pending. They are the particular propositions moved by the Senator from Massachusetts. They were presented by him as a whole; they were read from the desk as a whole, and at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts they were taken up paragraph by paragraph, just as a bill is taken up and considered paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if a tariff measure were before the Senate, would the Senator contend that a Senator who presented a half dozen amendments, to be voted upon from time to time, had presented a measure under this rule?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly not, because in that case the Senate would be proposing to vote upon the tariff bill and the amendments thereto; but here the Senate is proposing to vote upon the reservations and the resolution of ratification. Now, the cloture which I have proposed on behalf of the Senators who have signed it applies to the thing we are going to vote on, and the only thing we are going to vote on, to wit, the resolution of ratification which is now being perfected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is that resolution of ratification before the Senate? If so, when did it get here?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have stated that under the rules of the Senate the resolution itself is not before the Senate in Committee of the Whole; but the larger part of the resolution and the features which are to be the controlling factors in the resolution are here, and the cloture which I have proposed covers not only those reservations, but it covers the resolution itself, which the Senate will vote upon when it gets into the Senate proper, after the Committee of the Whole has made its report.

On November 6 the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made the following inquiry:

Of course, if the Senator is only offering them—

That is, the reservations and conditions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]— for the information of the Senate, that is a different proposition.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I propose to offer them now for action, and, if the Chair will permit me, reservations are not mentioned in the rules at all. The practice has been hitherto to offer reservations the last thing in the Senate, with the resolution of ratification. I am unable to see why they can not be offered in Committee of the Whole exactly as an amendment is offered, to be placed, exactly as an amendment has to be placed, upon the resolution of ratification when it is reached. That resolution can not be dealt with until the Senate has determined what amendments, if any, to make to the treaty, and what reservations, if any, it will adopt; and I have come to the conclusion, after studying the rules, that there is no reason why the reservations to be incorporated should not be offered at this stage, in order—as this treaty is of peculiar moment, unlike any other we have ever had—that the Senate may consider them in Committee of the Whole, and subsequently in the Senate, before final agreement to them.

Then the Senator from Alabama said:

Mr. President, I think this question is a matter of importance to our procedure, because we have got to know where the line rests when we finally go to vote. I think that the offering of reservations in the Committee of the Whole and not in the Senate proper is undoubtedly in contravention of the letter of the rules of the Senate. As to whether the rules of the Senate can limit the constitutional power of this body to adopt reservations or amendments, I have my doubts, and I am not concerned about that part of it. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not concerned as to whether it is against the letter of the rules of the Senate or not.

Subsequently, however, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said:

Mr. President, I have given this matter a great deal of reflection. I am not going to repeat what I have already said, but it seems to me that as that rule stands it is entirely in order to offer reservations in Committee of the Whole, and I think there are many reasons that might be adduced in its support. But I do not wish to delay the discussion by debating the point of order.

Then, later, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

Mr. President, I now, after some interruption, renew the motion which I made two hours ago. I move the adoption of the following conditions and reservations to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification. I have made a modification in the condition which is numbered 1, in regard to making the reservations and understandings a part of the conditional resolution of ratification, by inserting at the proper place the words "by an exchange of notes." I have also made, as Senators will see if they compare it with the print, one or two further changes that are of no importance. I shall ask for a vote on each paragraph separately after they have been read. I think they had all better be read first, so as to go into the RECORD, and then I shall ask to take up the first one for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator ask that they be also printed in the form of a bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I ask that they be printed in bill form, as read by the Secretary, for the use of the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that there is also submitted with these reservations a preamble, which is submitted for adoption as well as the several numbered reservations.

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned that, but I referred to it as conditions. It is generally called, and miscalled, a preamble. Of course, a preamble always precedes, and never follows, the enacting clause. It is really a declaration of conditions of ratification that has been called commonly the preamble.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The point I wanted to ascertain was whether or not the Senator, in asking for a vote upon each of these separately numbered reservations, would also ask for a vote upon what is commonly designated a preamble?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I certainly shall, and it is numbered 1 in what I have sent to the desk.

Then, Mr. President, on the order of the Vice President—and I ask the attention of the Chair to this—the Secretary read to the Senate the reservations and conditions proposed as a whole by the Senator from Massachusetts, and printed as requested in bill form, and that is the measure that is now before the Senate in Committee of the Whole. When it has been adopted, subject, of course, to amendment, it will be reported to the Senate by the Committee of the Whole, and in the Senate it will be incorporated in a resolution of ratification. Now, I have made the cloture apply to those reservations, so printed in bill form, presented as a whole to the Senate and now being considered paragraph by paragraph; also to the resolution of ratification in which they are to be incorporated; also to all amendments to them; also to all substitutes offered for them; and also to all additions proposed to them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the rule says "the pending measure." We are in legislative session now, but the pending measure in executive session is the treaty. It matters not how we reach a conclusion, whether we reach it by resolution or how we reach it, the pending measure is the treaty. If the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is in order, then it covers the pending measure, which is the treaty. If it is what he interprets it to be, it is clearly out of order. I ask the Chair to rule, because I want to make a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I am awaiting the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask a question before the ruling is made. This rule says "the pending question."

Mr. LODGE. It does not say "the pending question"; it says "the pending measure."

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator says "the pending measure." That is the entire treaty, the Senator insists. This is to affect a measure less than the treaty. Is not the lesser right to offer the cloture resolution included in the greater right? I have usually understood that to be the rule. The greater right would be to offer the cloture resolution for the entire treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have the floor, and I decline to yield further to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. FALL. If the rule will apply, then the treaty is the pending question. If the treaty is not the pending question, you can not invoke the rule on the treaty. Is not that correct?

Mr. LODGE. That is true. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before the Chair rules I ask the Chair's attention.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before the question is put——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all right, Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts desires to cut the Chair off from a ruling.

Mr. LODGE. What I wish to do is to promote the public business and not pass the whole morning in discussing a vague parliamentary point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the Chair is ready to rule. He announced that some time ago. I desired awhile ago to get the recognition of the Chair for a moment, and if the Senator from Massachusetts has yielded the floor I ask for recognition, although I recognize that it is in the discretion of the Chair as to whether he desires to hear me or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Alabama for a brief time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the only reason why I delay the Chair by what I have to say is that I think the pending question is most important as affecting the orderly and proper conduct of the business of the Senate. My understanding is that this is the first time the cloture rule has come before the Senate for actual interpretation, and I think we ought to clearly interpret it, and the Senate ought to express its sentiment on the question.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has offered a cloture rule or proposal, under the rules of the Senate, to limit debate on the pending measure. The country has waited with patience since last May for the conclusion of this war. It is perfectly evident that unless a majority of the Senate is willing to do business the country must continue to wait for a month longer before there is any opportunity to close the war. This is an effort to use the only weapon the Senate has to protect itself and transact its business in an orderly way and reach a conclusion.

Mr. President, I think the country should know who is delaying procedure in the Senate and who is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Alabama allow a suggestion? The observations now being made will not be helpful to the Chair in construing the rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to that, Mr. President. The construction of this rule must turn on the question as to whether the treaty with Germany is the pending measure or whether the proposals offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] are the pending measure. That is the question before the Senate.

Some time ago, at the beginning of the last Congress, facing a condition of war, the Senate found itself in a most embarrassing position because it did not have a cloture rule, and finally, practically by unanimous consent, the present rule was adopted. It is not much of a rule; it is a poor excuse for a rule; but it is the only rule the Senate has by which debate can be terminated.

Now we come to the question as to whether this rule can be applied to the most important proposition that has come before the Senate almost in its history, the question as to whether we can make peace and close this Great War, or whether we can not.

It is apparent, Mr. President, what is the effort that is being made here today. Some of us desire to bring this debate to a conclusion. Some of us desire that the voice of the Senate may be registered and the question pending before us may be terminated. Others are evidently of a contrary mind.

Mr. President, there is no use to try to becloud this question. There are a number of Senators on this floor who are unwilling to vote for the resolution of ratification offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. They desire an opportunity to vote for the unconditional ratification of the treaty. Suppose, under this rule, we apply cloture to the treaty, the rule being that the cloture must apply to the pending measure, and the Chair holds that the treaty with all amendments and reservations that have been proposed to it is the pending measure and the Lodge resolution of ratification is defeated. Does the Chair put us in the attitude of defeating the treaty, and say that we can have no further action on the matter? I do not absolutely say that that is the final conclusion, but the Chair's ruling against the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska might lead to that conclusion, and that after the adoption of cloture the Senate would be driven either to accepting the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts or to rejecting in its entirety the treaty of peace with Germany.

Now, I say to the Chair that in a legislative body, where the opportunity for free action is sought, the opportunity should be given to defeat the proposals of the Senator from Massachusetts, if more than a third of this body are against it, and yet leave it wide open for the Senate to come to some other conclusion about the matter.

The Vice President in his ruling the other day, on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], said that he recognized that he was not standing on the letter of the law, that he was not giving the rule a strict construction, but on account of the importance of this matter he was ruling so that the Senate might have a broad and unlimited right of action in the Committee of the Whole, and his ruling was accepted by the Senate without dissent.

Now, are we to be forced by the ruling of the Chair that we must either abandon cloture, when we are like a ship tossed in the tempest, without a rudder, when this great condition faces the people of the United States, or under this rule is the Chair going to give us an opportunity to close the debate within a reasonable time on the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts? If he succeeds, if he can command a two-thirds vote of the Senate, a conclusion of this matter has been reached; but if he can not command a two-thirds vote of the Senate, does the Senator from Massachusetts, and those who are following him on the other side of the Chamber, desire to foreclose this matter and say that with that defeat the treaty must fail also? Or, does he propose, and does the Senate propose, that under these conditions we may yet have an opportunity to reach a conclusion by which the treaty of peace may be ratified?

Mr. President, this whole proposition turns on the construction by the Chair as to what the words "the pending measure" mean. Is the pending measure the resolutions proposed the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], or is it the treaty? The Chair is out in an unknown sea without parliamentary compass to guide him, because this is the first time this question has ever been presented. I contend that the treaty is not the pending measure. We may legislate in reference to a strike condition. The "pending measure" is the bill relating to the subject; the strike condition is the matter we legislate about. We may legislate about the great shipping interests of the United States. Are the shipping interests "the pending measure," or is the bill or measure affecting them before the Senate "the pending measure"? A pending measure, in my judgment, means a bill, resolution, or other parliamentary action that is before us for our consideration. The treaty of peace is a conclusion reached by 26 different nations. It is an existing fact. The question before us is as to whether we will join in the conclusion of these other nations.

I think it is idle to say that the treaty of peace is pending before the Senate for consideration. The pending measure is the resolution that proposes the action of the Senate as to whether we shall join in the treaty of peace or reject it. Therefore, I think the Senator from Nebraska is eminently right when he says this proposal relates to the reservations and not to the treaty.

More than that, Mr. President, I say that the Senate, acting through its Presiding Officer, should act in this matter in the mode that enables us to do business and not in the manner that will hamper us in doing business in the future. If the Chair decides that the pending measure before the Senate is the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, then we can close debate on it and the Senator from Massachusetts, if he wants a vote, can get it. It may be that he does not want a vote. But the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska will bring to a final conclusion, without doubt in a few days, the question as to whether the proposals of the Senator from Massachusetts shall be agreed to and the treaty ratified.

I can not see why the majority side of the Chamber should object to coming to a conclusion on their own proposal. More than that, I can not see how the majority side of the Chamber can say to the country: We want a rule adopted by which if we can not have our own way we will tear down the house; if we can not have our own conclusion on our own proposal, no other man's proposal shall be considered.

That being the case, I say, in the interest of liberality, in the interest of action, in the interest of attending to the country's business, the Chair should rule that the pending measure is the reservations of the Senator from Massachusetts. By so doing we will reach an early conclusion and an early disposition of the matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order unless——

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would withdraw his point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well; let us have a cloture rule if the Senator wants to have it.

Mr. LODGE. All right, I will withdraw my point of order and let the Senator state his view.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have not taken much of the time of the Senate, and I do not intend to. I merely want to say that I do not propose to rest under the imputation of seeking to delay the treaty or prevent cloture. I am in favor of cloture, and I am in favor of bringing the consideration of the treaty to a close. For four or five months it has been before the Senate, and the country and the Senate are utterly disgusted with dilatory tactics.

Mr. OWEN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is time now to have a vote on the treaty. Discussion will not change a single vote in the Chamber, and everyone knows it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair makes the same suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota that he did to the Senator from Alabama. The Chair desires to apply the rule. It is not a question of whether it is desirable to bring debate to a close or not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Alabama was allowed to make his remarks upon the subject, and all I have to say is that I am in favor of an effective cloture or an immediate agreement for a final vote upon the treaty and all amendments, reservations, and resolutions. Therefore, I believe that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska is not in order or sufficient. It does not bring the pending measure to a close simply to have a cloture upon the reservations that have been proposed, and then another cloture upon the resolution of ratification, and then another cloture upon the second or third or fourth resolution, if they can propose such.

The proper construction of the rule seems to be this—and let me read two or three sentences:

Thereafter—

That is, after the cloture—

no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. * * * Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close.

In my opinion the pending measure is the treaty, and no amendment can be offered after the vote on this proposed cloture next Saturday morning, if cloture shall be adopted.

The resolution of ratification and reservations are "motions affecting the same" and need not be presented before Saturday. In any event, all the reservations one may desire may be presented by Saturday morning.

I wish the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] would present a motion for cloture that will end the debate. I do not believe the present motion prevents the introduction of another resolution of ratification or other reservations. If that is prevented, it is by another rule of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I insist upon the regular order, which is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to read just a line out of the RECORD for the Chair. I read from the Journal the first motion made with reference to this question:

On motion by Senator LODGE,
The Senate proceeded to consider, as in open executive session, the treaty of peace with Germany.

That motion has been, in substance, renewed here from day to day, and that is the form of the matter. I next read in full from the RECORD:

Mr. LODGE. Is morning business closed, Mr. President?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.
Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed in open executive session to consider the treaty of peace with Germany.
The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

That is the pending question, according to the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that this is not the time to determine what the pending measure is or what motions or amendments may be in order, if the motion for cloture is sustained. The motion presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] attempts to prescribe a parliamentary procedure and to determine in advance what that procedure shall be.

In the opinion of the Chair such a motion is not within the rule of the Senate, and therefore the point of order made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is sustained.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, from the decision of the Chair I take an appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is a debatable question.

Mr. LODGE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts has not been recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order that the question is a debatable question and I desire to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is a debatable question.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nebraska made an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and I immediately rose and moved to lay the appeal on the table, which I had a right to do. That is a privileged motion and it is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Had I the recognition of the Chair? I understood that the Senator from Massachusetts was not recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Nebraska yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not yield at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state the inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Chair hear the Senator from Massachusetts make his motion? I think, from what the Chair said to the Senator from Nebraska, that the Chair failed to hear the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was made and which he afterwards renewed.

The Senator from Massachusetts made a motion to lay the appeal on the table as soon as the appeal was taken. Is not that a privilege that he has?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands, and that is the question before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. That is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BORAH. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would withdraw his motion. I do not want to cut off debate from those who are desirous of closing debate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I insist upon the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona calls for the regular order. The motion by the Senator from Massachusetts to lay the appeal on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. LODGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY'S name was called). I announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] is absent from the Senate on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. As he is absent to-day, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] on business of the Senate. The Senator from Oregon is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and the Senator from Ohio is paired for the day with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CALDER. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] on the business of the Senate. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX. I inquire if the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KNOX. Having a pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. I transfer the pair announced by me with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE entered the Chamber.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Oklahoma having arrived in the Chamber, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 36, as follows:

FUNERAL OF SENATOR THOMAS S. MARTIN.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, my deceased colleague, the late Senator MARTIN, of Virginia, will be buried at Charlottesville, Va., to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock. In addition to the 18 Senators who have been appointed to attend the funeral, a great many Senators have expressed a desire also to attend. The special train for Charlottesville will leave here at 11 o'clock to-morrow and return about 9 o'clock to-morrow night. I have consulted with the leader of the majority of this body and with other Senators, and, in order to pay tribute to the memory of my late colleague, I ask unanimous consent, so that Senators who desire may attend the funeral—and an invitation is extended to all to do so—that when the Senate takes a recess to-day it shall take a recess to meet at 10 o'clock on Saturday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before that motion is put, I desire to introduce one or two bills and to make a very brief comment on them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I must ask for the regular order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I also insist upon the regular order, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] moves——

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I understand, the regular order is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. LODGE. The regular order is a privileged motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts is in order at any time. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] would present a real cloture rule. I anticipate that, if one is not presented by the other side in a very short time, there will be one presented from this side which will take care of the "pending measure," so that we may have the cloture rule upon every feature of the pending measure. The cloture rule provides:

> Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time.

To the suggestion I am about to make, I ask the attention of the Chair. I am not certain whether as the cloture rule reads there must be an actual reading by the Secretary of amendments proposed at the time they are presented. I have prepared some amendments to propose to the proposed reservations. I shall present them at this time, and if the Chair holds that if a cloture rule should be adopted they could not be presented unless they had been read to the Senate prior to the time when they are offered as amendments, I shall ask that they be read at this time. If the opposite ruling should be made, that the mere presentation, having them printed and asking that they lie upon the table be sufficient, I should be satisfied, of course, with that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair may not be in the chair at the time that question shall be decided. If the Senator from North Dakota desires that the proposals he now makes shall be read, they will be read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it necessary in order to be certain that they might be presented, if the cloture rule is adopted, to ask that the amendments may be read. I wish to say before that is done, however, that all of the proposed reservations from No. 2 to No. 6, inclusive, represent a compromise between those of divergent views, and that I shall support all of those that do really represent a compromise, or, at least, those in connection with which I was a party to such compromise. My amendments and reservations do not affect anything prior to reservation No. 7, to which I have not agreed; nor have I agreed to any of the other reservations except those indicated. I think that reservations Nos. 8 and 9 and 10 in reality correspond to the present meaning, in spirit, at least, of the treaty provisions, and Nos. 11 and 12 I consider very unimportant; but Nos. 13, 14, and 15, to my view, should be stricken out.

Now, I present the reservations and amendments intended to be proposed by me and ask that they be read, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if the reservations he is now presenting constitute full and complete reservations which the Senator desires to present to the ratification resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. They do, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do they include those on page 27 of the publication I hold in my hand and with which the Senator is familiar?

Mr. McCUMBER. They include some of them, at least, and some have been slightly modified.

There being no objection, the amendments presented by Mr. McCUMBER to the reservations proposed by Mr. LODGE on behalf of the committee were read, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table, as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO RESERVATIONS.

Amendments and substitutes offered by Mr. McCUMBER to the reservations on the treaty of peace with Germany adopted by the Committee on Foreign Relations and presented on the calendar day of November 6 (legislative day of November 3), 1919, and printed in bill form:

No. 1. Strike out all of reservation No. 7, lines 16 to 20, inclusive, on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The United States refrains from entering into any agreement on its part in reference to the matters contained in articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action in respect to any controversy which may arise in relation thereto."

No. 2. Strike out committee reservation No. 14, lines 24 and 25, on page 5, and lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, on page 6.

No. 3. Strike out No. 15 of said committee reservation, lines 5 to 11, inclusive, on page 6.

No. 4. Add at the end of said committee reservations a further reservation, as follows:

"That the United States understands and so construes the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations that when the case referred to the council or the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire are also represented in the body to which the case is referred, or involves a dispute between one member and any such dominion, colony, or part of empire, both the disputant members, including the dominion or principal country and all its said dominions, colonies, and parts of empire are to be excluded from voting upon any phase of the dispute."

No. 5. Add at the end of the committee reservations a further reservation, as follows:

"That the United States understands and construes the words 'dispute between members' and the words 'dispute between parties' in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein, and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in that last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies."

No. 6. Add at the end of said committee reservations the following:

"The United States refrains from entering into any agreement concerning the matters contained in Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) of the said treaty unless Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall hereafter provide therefor."

No. 7. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive), unless Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

No. 8. Mr. McCUMBER also presented a proposed amendment to the reservation intended to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], relating to the right of disputants, including self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empires, as follows:

Add at the end of said proposed reservation the following words:

"Unless upon the submission of the matter to the council or assembly for decision, report, or finding the United States consents that the said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire may each have the right to cast a separate vote upon the said decision, report, or finding."

No. 9. Mr. McCUMBER also presented a proposed amendment to the reservation intended to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], relating to the right of disputants, including self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, as follows:

Substitute for the said proposed amendment the following:

"The United States reserves the right, upon the submission of any dispute to the council or the assembly, to object to any member and its self-governing dominions, dependencies, or possessions having in the aggregate more than one vote; and in case such objection is made the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, finding, or decision in which such member and its said dominions, dependencies, and possessions have in the aggregate cast more than one vote."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed reservation, which I ask to have read and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The Secretary read as follows:

Reservation proposed by Mr. LENROOT as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany:

"The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted."

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Lodge	Shields
Ball	Gronna	McCumber	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending reservation, to be considered as soon as the amendment now before the Senate shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the reservations printed in bill form, line 4, after the word "obligation," insert the words "beyond the expiration of five years from the ratification of this treaty."

Mr. REED. Would the Senator be willing to further limit that to those countries that have been created as a result of the war, like Czechoslovakia and Poland?

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment which I offered is designed to test the wisdom of the Senate upon the proposition suggested some time ago by Mr. Elihu Root, and which, in my judgment, is well worthy of our serious consideration in connection with this reservation. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that in the event of the rejection of this proposed amendment it is my purpose to follow it up with another amendment restricting the operation of the reservation to the newly created countries of Central Europe.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit the following reservation, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have it read?

Mr. OWEN. No; I merely want to have it printed.

The reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. OWEN is as follows:

Resolved, That the United States in ratifying the covenant of the league of nations does not intend to be understood as modifying in any degree the obligations entered into by the United States and the Entente Allies in the agreement of November 5, 1918, upon which as a basis the German Empire laid down its arms. The United States regards that contract to carry out the principles set forth by the President of the United States on January 8, 1918, and in subsequent addresses, as a world agreement, binding on the great Nations which entered into it, and that the principles there set forth will be carried out in due time through the mechanism provided in the covenant, and that article 23, paragraph (b), pledging the members of the league to undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants under their control, involves a pledge to carry out these principles.

The protectorate of Great Britain over Egypt is understood to be merely a means through which the nominal suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt shall be transferred to the Egyptian people, and shall not be construed as a recognition by the United States in Great Britain of any sovereign rights over the Egyptian people or as depriving the people of Egypt of any of their rights of self-government.

On November 6, 1918, Secretary of State Lansing published the following to the world:

"From the Secretary of State to the Minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"November 5, 1918.

"SIR: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government:

"In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that, if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

"The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the Allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:

"'The Allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"'Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the Allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air.'

"I am instructed by the President to say that he is in agreement with the interpretation set forth in the last paragraph of the memorandum above quoted. I am further instructed by the President to request you to notify the German Government that Marshal Foch has been authorized by the Government of the United States and the Allied Governments to receive properly accredited representatives of the German Government, and to communicate to them the terms of the armistice.

"Accept, sir, with renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

"(Signed) ROBERT LANSING."

Among other things the President, on January 8, 1918, in his address to Congress, said:

"We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war therefore is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The program of the world's peace therefore is our program; and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this:

"I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

"II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

"III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

"IV. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

"V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

"VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

"VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

"VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

"IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

"X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

"XI. Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan States to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guarantees of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan States should be entered into.

"XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guaranties.

"XIII. An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territory integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

"XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I send some reservations to the desk which I shall propose, and which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the reservations intended to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Secretary read as follows:

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

1. That nothing contained in article 2 of the league covenant, or any other provision thereof, shall be construed to deny to the people of Ireland, India, Egypt, Korea, or to any other people living under a Government which, as to such people, does not derive its powers from the consent of the governed, the right of revolution or the right to alter or abolish such government, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations in such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

2. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league at the end of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, unless within that time each member of the league shall abolish and discontinue the policy of maintaining its army or navy in time of peace by conscription.

3. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league at the end of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, unless within that time each member of the league shall have agreed that in no case will it resort to war except to suppress an insurrection or repel an actual invasion of its territory, until an advisory vote of its people has first been taken on the question of peace or war.

4. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations at the end of any year during a period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, unless during each and every year of the five-year period every member of the league now expending in excess of $50,000,000 for the maintenance of its military forces or in excess of a like sum for the maintenance of its naval establishment, shall fail to reduce such expenditures by a sum equal to one-fifth of the amount by which the total annual expenditure for the maintenance of military forces or naval establishment, respectively, exceeds the sum of $50,000,000 for either, to the end that by the close of the period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty no member of the league of nations shall expend for the maintenance of its military forces or its naval establishment, respectively, an amount in excess of $50,000,000 per annum; and the United States gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations at the end of any year thereafter whenever any member expends for the maintenance of its military forces, or its naval establishment, respectively, an amount in excess of $50,000,000 per annum.

5. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations whenever any member or members of the league of nations shall attempt to acquire the whole or any part of the territory of any member or of any nation not a member of the league of nations against the will and without the full and free consent of the people of such member or of such nation not a member of the league of nations.

6. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations wherever any member, exercising a mandate or a protectorate over any country, or claiming and exercising a sphere of influence in or over any country, shall, without the free and full consent of the people of such country, appropriate the natural resources thereof, or shall, directly or indirectly, aid any individual or corporation alien to such country to acquire any right or title to or any concession in its natural resources, or right or title to its property, real or personal, or shall fail or neglect, within such authority or influence as it may properly exercise, to preserve in trust for the people of such country all right and title to and in its natural resources and real and personal property, or shall fail to exercise such mandate, protectorate, or sphere of influence over such country for the sole benefit of the people thereof.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. Joseph W. Folk relative to the mandate held by Zagloul Pasha, Mahmoud Pasha, and others, who represent the Egyptian people, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 12, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You spoke to me some days ago about a mandate held by Zagloul Pasha, Mahmoud Pasha, and others to represent the Egyptian people. This mandate is in writing and signed by the members of the legislative assembly, of the provincial councils, members of the different municipalities, the mayors, and notables. The original is in Paris, but I am inclosing you an outline of it.

Of course, at this stage of the proceedings, whether they represent the Egyptian people is not the question, but the right of the Egyptian people to self-determination is the question. However, there can be no doubt but that Zagloul Pasha and Mahmoud Pasha have behind them a united Egyptian people, regardless of religion or past affiliations.

With best wishes, I am,

Cordially, yours,

JOS. W. FOLK.

Copy of mandate from members of the legislative assembly of Egypt and Egyptian people to Zagloul Pasha, Mahmoud Pasha, and others.

"I, ——— ———, hereby delegate Zagloul Pasha, Mahmoud Pasha, etc., etc., to represent the Egyptian people in pleading the case of our country wherever it seems to them desirable, and to attain by legal means the independence to which Egypt is legally entitled."

This mandate has been signed by the members of the legislative assembly, and of the provincial councils, members of the different municipalities, the mayors of the country, and the notables. The number of signatures received amounts to approximately 100,000.

The dispute which arose at one time in England as to whether we represented the Egyptian people has ceased since the revolution of March and April last, in which all classes of the country joined in support of their interned representatives. Rushdi Pasha, who was prime minister until May last, said in an interview of recent date that the delegation represented the entire people of Egypt. He declared "he never consented to the 'protectorate' of Great Britain over Egypt except that it was temporary and a war measure, and that it would disappear when the Allies' victory was complete. He asked England to hear him and to hear the Egyptian nation, duly represented by the Egyptian delegation.

And now I have the Cairo and Alexandria papers, in which the members of the legislative assembly, at the request of their constituents, are declaring publicly that the people will have nothing to do with the Milner commission, which they assert is intruding on the liberties and independence of Egypt. The only body, they declared, which can have the power of negotiation for the future of Egypt is the Egyptian delegation, which, at the same time, can not negotiate anything less than the complete independence of Egypt.

In the Cairo paper, "Pyramids," of October 14, Mustapha Bekir Bey, member of the legislative assembly from the Province of Benha, wrote:

"My constituents are desirous of my opinion being given publicly with regard to the Milner commission. I regret that they should have hesitated as to my patriotism. Perhaps they thought the humiliation to which I submitted might affect my attitude. I gave my mandate to the Egyptian delegation to plead the cause of Egypt before the conference and to attain the independence to which Egypt is entitled. And now I would only say to the Milner commission that it is not competent to deal with the situation; that our case is being tried before a supreme and competent court; and that the delegation is alone competent to deal with the situation."

(This cablegram was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator OWEN.)

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the yea and nay votes have not been ordered on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the main question, but not on the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. KNOX. I withhold my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. If the junior Senator from Michigan were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I desire to know if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. I have a pair with him for the day. Not knowing how he would vote on this amendment, I withdraw my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]. If present, the Senator from Alabama would vote "nay."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have a pair with that Senator for the day. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a pair with that Senator, and not knowing how he would vote on this question I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 68, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was not agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a very short statement of the American reply to the Pope of August 27, 1917, from the War Cyclopedia, showing the responsibility of the present war to be on the German military autocrary, and Mr. Gardiner's statement of their purposes at the same time.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GERMAN MILITARY AUTOCRACY—RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE PRESENT WAR.

The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible government, which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honor; which chose its own time for the war; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly; stopped at no barrier either of law or of mercy; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood—not the blood of soldiers only but the blood of innocent women and children also, and of the helpless poor—and now stands balked, but not defeated, the enemy of four-fifths of the world. This power is not the German people. It is the ruthless master of the German people. It is no business of ours how that great people came under its control or submitted with temporary zest to the domination of its purpose; but it is our business to see to it that the history of the rest of the world is no longer left to his handling.

[From the Manufacturers' Record, November 1, 1917.]

GERMANY'S WAR PLANS FOR WORLD DOMINION.

Statesmen and other students of international politics for the past 15 or more years have been watching the evolution of Germany's plans to conquer actual world dominion as outlined in the following text and maps.

These plans are so amazingly ambitious and are founded on such an utterly cynical and ruthless disregard of the rights and liberties of all non-Germans that for 10 or 12 years those men who first caught their sinister trend were discredited. Then, as the German plan of political and economic strategy developed step by step with her military conduct of the present war, it became generally recognized that in fact she is trying actually to make real the Pan-German plan; and, failing that, to lay the solid foundation for its future execution by first building an unassailable Empire from the Baltic to the Arabian Sea.

For years many astute and experienced statesmen dismissed this matter as preposterous, only to see it take material form and threaten to overwhelm them and their nations.

Likewise, those who have not for many years made a study of international politics or who have not read many of the books recently written on the politics and economics which caused the present war may be inclined to dismiss these Pan-German plans as impracticable and absurd.

Herein we have endeavored merely to summarize the situation in simplest outline, purposely omitting overintricate affairs in the Far East. We, however, venture the earnest suggestion that those who want really to understand the causes, purposes, and world peril of Germany's war plans consider the appended bibliography, and especially the German section of it; therein they will find ample direct and collateral confirmation of this outline of some of the purposes of the Pan-Germans.

The first map shows the present situation in Europe and the dependencies of European countries in Africa as they were before the war.

[Map 1 includes Prussia, Germany, Bulgaria, Roumania, Balkan States, Turkey, and African colonial possessions.]

Particular attention is directed to the black area, indicating the fact that since August, 1914, Prussia has acquired by the war actual dominion over Belgium, Austria-Hungary, the Balkans (except Greece), Turkey in Europe and Asia, and a section of western Russia.

A pamphlet entitled "Our Peril from Germany's Aggressive Growth," issued in July, 1917, by the National Security League, treats in detail of the plans and methods whereby Prussia has actually increased her dominion by this war from 70,000,000 people to over 170,000,000 people.

Having done this, she is now desperately trying to get peace on such terms that she can hold this dominion over her present allies and reorganize them for her next move.

The second map shows what is known as the Pan-German plan of 1911—note that, the Pan-German plan of 1911!

[Map 2 adds to above Arabia, Egypt, and Belgian Africa, and southern half of South America, Chile, Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Dutch Guiana as dependencies.]

Six years ago Prussia planned to acquire dominion over Austria-Hungary, all the Balkans, and all of Turkey; to conquer and absorb Belgium and Holland and all their colonies, as well as all of Russia west of a line between Riga and Odessa, and, likewise northern France, Switzerland, and northeastern Italy.

But it was not in the plan that Great Britain should come into the war until after France and Russia had been beaten and Belgium and Holland absorbed. Then, having control of Turkey, which it was thought had the moral control of the Mohammedan world, she intended to start a rebellion against Great Britain in Egypt.

In this way Prussia expected to break the British Empire at its waist, the Suez Canal, after having beaten England's allies, France and Russia. But even more important to Prussia than this would have been the establishment of a solid empire from the North Sea and the Baltic to the Arabian Sea, and controlling the Black Sea and the eastern Mediterranean. Thus centrally established, she could divide Europe, bottle up Russia, and dominate Asia and Africa.

But as all the Pan-German plan of 1911 has been included in that of 1915, we may pass to a more detailed consideration of the latter.

In 1914 Prussia had planned to crush France and defeat Russia before Great Britain should have come into the war. But even with Great Britain in, the latter's early military work was so slow and comparatively inefficient that in 1915 Prussia still believed that she could first crush France, then put Russia out of the war, and then draw in and annihilate all Great Britain's armies.

Her wonderfully successful aggressions in Russia and the Balkans, contrasted with the Allies' failures in Flanders, Champagne, the Carpathians, the Balkans, Mesopotamia, and at Gallipoli, seemed to promise Prussia complete victory; and complete victory over France and Great Britain meant to Prussia that she could take any or all their colonies, dependencies, and protectorates, and thus put under her heel for all time the only powers which then stood between her and her realization of world dominion.

So in 1915 the Pan-German plan of 1911 was expanded as shown in the third map. [Map 3 add to all above all of Africa except Abyssinia, Liberia, and Spain's holding on West Coast, Persia, Afghanistan, India, Indo-China, Siam, all of South America except Brazil, Mexico, Central American States, except Panama, and Canada and Ireland, as dependencies, etc.]

On the surface this seems too ridiculously preposterous to receive serious thought, but to the minds of the world-conquering Prussian autocrats it was perfectly logical and feasible, as is evidenced by their contemporaneous writings.

At the close of 1915 Prussia was everywhere victorious and controlled about 100,000,000 enthusiastically subservient allies in Austria-Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey, which latter held the religious leadership of the fanatical Mohammedan world.

At Verdun, Prussia intended to break through the French line and swiftly overwhelm France. This done, she expected that Russia would go out of the war, possibly by an imperial treaty treasonable to the Russian people.

After disposing of France and Russia, Prussia planned to concentrate on the annihilation of Great Britain's armies, which she expected would be rushed to the rescue of France.

Thus crushed, France and Great Britain were to lose all standing in the eyes of their millions of Mohammedan dependents throughout Africa and Asia.

Simultaneously, native revolts, inspired and led by Germans, were to throw the British out of Egypt and India, and, indeed, in Egypt a revolt was started and promptly suppressed.

According to the Prussian war plan, these revolts were to give Prussia dominion from northern Africa to Indo-China; Persia and Afghanistan were to come in as vassal allies and through them Mohammedan Turkestan was to become a Teutonic sphere of influence.

As a result of the downfall of France and the prestige which Germany would thus acquire, all the French dependencies in Africa and Asia, as well as French Guiana and the French West Indies, were to come to Germany, for, of course, they could not defend themselves if unsupported by French money, supplies, and troops.

Likewise, the annihilation of the British armies and the revolt of Egypt and India would so paralyze Great Britain on land that Prussia could seize all her colonies and dependencies in Africa, throughout which Germany would have land communication, through Asia Minor and Egypt, inaccessible to the great British navy.

Once France and Great Britain were out of the way, Prussia planned the prompt seizure of all the foreign domains of Italy, Portugal, Belgium, and Holland, which, under such circumstances, could easily be conquered.

Thus she believed she could make real the condition shown by the third map in Africa and Asia.

The lower half of South America Prussia planned to acquire by peaceful penetration, revolution, and political intrigue.

As to the progress made to date on these lines, note that in the very small section of Brazil, south of the tropic of Capricorn, there are now over 400,000 native-born Germans, and that native-born Germans are largely in control of the finances and commerce of Chile and Argentina; note that since 1916 there has been a German rebellion in southern Brazil, and also note the equivocal positions of the Governments of Chile and Argentina at the same time.

Realizing the overwhelming prestige which the complete accomplishment of her plans in Africa and Asia would give her, Prussia believed that Venezuela, Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador, and possibly Colombia, would come under her sway by whatever combination of peaceful penetration, rebellion, and political corruption might be called for.

In holding this opinion, the Prussian autocrats realize the high degree of commercial and political penetration now actually accomplished in these countries.

In passing, it is worth noting that in his "War," published in 1906, Klaus Wagner suggests (p. 170) that the "inefficient" non-German population of South America be exported by Germany to reservations in Africa, "where they may crawl slowly toward the peaceful death of weary and hopeless senility."

As an index, sufficient for the moment, of the control Prussia thought she had over Mexico, and incidentally over Central America, note the terse proposal Herr Zimmermann made to Mexico, that she attack the United States, and that she, as the agent of Germany, get Japan to join her in the attack.

On the 25th of May, 1917, Secretary Franklin K. Lane said that Germany "would certainly demand from an overwhelmed England, Canada, on the north, by way of indemnity." And he might well have added Bermuda on the east and all the British West Indies on the south, none of which have the means or facilities to conduct a successful modern defense without outside assistance.

To the Teutonic mind this plan for an actual world dominion was as axiomatic as that two and two make four—provided France could be crushed, Russia eliminated, and then Great Britain crushed.

But, great as the land dominions thus accomplished would be, the maritime results would be equally important. Observe that the third map shows that every intercontinental ocean-trade route is controlled at one or both ends or in the middle by German dominion, save only that from San Francisco to Yokohama—and that is threatened. Even the route from our San Francisco through our Panama Canal to New York would pass through the German West Indies.

With such an absolute control of "the freedom of the seas," Germany could control the commerce of all nations and make all her dominions contributory to upbuilding only her own economic and martial strength, while all other nations could be commercially starved. But she might permit them "one boat a week, painted red and white, in vertical stripes three meters wide," such as she told America she might send to Europe when America was at peace with Germany.

Is not all this on land and sea as important to America as to Great Britain and France? If America had not joined in the war, and if Germany had made a separate peace with Russia and then crushed France and Great Britain, what would have prevented her from making the third map real? America? But America would then have stood alone against a Prussian autocracy which controlled all but one of the ocean trade routes of the world, and on land the comparison would have been as follows:

	Area.	Population.
	Sq. miles.
Prussia, the ruler	134,600	40,000,000
The subjects:
In Europe	722,600	149,700,000
In Asia	6,401,800	439,250,000
In Africa	10,960,000	160,750,000
In South America	3,501,000	13,420,000
In North America	5,000,000	27,000,000
Total dominions of the Kaiser	26,720,000	830,120,000
In contrast to Continental United States	3,000,000	100,000,000

How preposterous this seems to Americans! And yet it is the cold-blooded and hard-headed plan and aim of the Prussian autocrats—it is merely "Deutschland über alles"—made real as the result merely of crushing France and Great Britain before America can help them sufficiently to turn back the campaign for "world dominion (or downfall)," which Prussia started in 1914. It is the plan Germany may yet be hoping to make real if she can soon get a separate peace with Russia, and, then, one after the other, crush France and Great Britain before America can effectively support them.

This is the more important part of the Pan-German war plan, for the realization of which the pro-Germans all over the world have been working with the blind assistance of the pacificists, who have tried to hold back the shields and swords of their countries defensively opposed to the Prussian aggression for real world dominion—the aim of all the years of training of all Germany to the highest "efficiency."

We now know that Prussia started this war in order to conquer world dominion for herself; we know in what a barbarous, ruthless, and loathsome way Prussia makes war, and that France, Great Britain, and their allies have stood the brunt of it for three years.

We now know that if they had fallen the Prussian vulture-eagle would now be soaring over most of North and South America, making ready for the next sweep; and, therefore, that our safety actually demands that we support all our allies as quickly and as powerfully as possible.

We now know that for America, as well as for the democracies of Europe, it is literally "win the war or perish!"

We now know that all Berlin's recent peace talks have the main purpose of getting a temporary peace on such terms that the present grip of the Hohenzollerns on all their present allies will not be broken; this because they want a breathing spell in order to reorganize the peoples now under their dominion for a fresh attack which will carry out the Pan-German plan for world dominion.

Realizing this, we recognize that the safety of democracy and of personal liberty demands that we fight until Prussia's present allies are freed from the hold she has fixed upon them by this war. The freedom of the world rests on the freeing of Austria-Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey from Prussia.

To liberate them, to win safety for ourselves and our children, will require that we all devote every thought and word and act to winning the war.

For the present we must shut out from our minds all diverting thoughts of peace, being convinced that an enduring peace will come most quickly only if we devote every thought to fighting for victory.

America's power will come only from the loyal service of every individual citizen, be it rendered on land or sea, under arms or at the workbench.

Now, in the light of all these facts, ask of yourself:

"Have I so far done everything I possibly can to help America win the war?"

"Am I now planning my life and my work primarily to help America win the war—as every man and woman in Germany is doing for her—or am I 'just hoping that somehow some kind of peace will come soon'?"

"Am I a loyal American worker or a moral slacker?"

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have heretofore, in great detail, placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD proof of the German conspiracy to dominate the world. To this record I refer and to the War Information Series, by the Committee on Public Information, George Creel, chairman; to "The origins of the war," by I. H. Rose, Cambridge Press, 1915; The Evidences of Germany's Guilt, by Louis Barthou, former premier of France; New York Times Current History, pages 78 to 84.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to call up my proposed amendment to reservation No. 3, and I ask that the Secretary may again read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposes the following amendment to the proposed committee reservation No. 3, as follows:

On page 2, line 4, after the word "obligation," insert the words "beyond the expiration of five years from the ratification of this treaty," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

The United States assumes no obligation beyond the expiration of five years from the ratification of this treaty to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country,

And so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the obvious effect of this amendment will be to postpone the operation of the reservation for five years from the date of ratification. It embodies the suggestion of Mr. Elihu Root, as stated in the letter of March 29 last, addressed by that distinguished statesman to the chairman of the Republican national committee. I shall detain the Senate only long enough to read that part of the letter referring to article 10 of the treaty:

The fourth point upon which I think there should be an amendment is article 10, which contains the undertaking "To respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league."

Looking at this article as a part of a perpetual league for the preservation of peace, my first impression was that the whole article ought to be stricken out.

I should perhaps say just here that in a subsequent communication to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] dated June 19, 1919, Mr. Root reiterated that opinion, which seems to have been his final conclusion upon the subject. But I prefer his former one:

Looking at this article as a part of a perpetual league for the preservation of peace, my first impression was that the whole article ought to be stricken out. If perpetual, it would be an attempt to preserve for all time unchanged the distribution of power and territory made in accordance with the views and exigencies of the Allies in this present juncture of affairs. It would necessarily be futile. It would be what was attempted by the peace of Westphalia at the close of the Thirty Years' War, at the Congress of Vienna at the close of the Napoleonic wars, by the Congress of Berlin in 1878. It would not only be futile; it would be mischievous. Change and growth are the law of life, and no generation can impose its will in regard to the growth of nations and the distribution of power upon succeeding generations.

I think, however, that this article must be considered not merely with reference to the future but with reference to the present situation in Europe. Indeed, this whole agreement ought to be considered in that double aspect. The belligerent power of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey has been destroyed; but that will not lead to future peace without a reconstruction of eastern Europe and western Asia. The vast territories of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, and the Romanoffs have lost the rulers who formerly kept the population in order and are filled with turbulent masses without stable government, unaccustomed to self-control, and fighting among themselves like children of the dragon's teeth. There can be no settled peace until these masses are reduced to order. Since the Bolsheviki have been allowed to consolidate the control which they established with German aid in Russia, the situation is that Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, with a population of less than 130,000,000, are confronted with the disorganized but vigorous and warlike population of Germany, German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Russia, amounting approximately to 280,000,000, fast returning to barbarism and the lawless violence of barbarous races. Order must be restored. The allied nations in their council must determine the lines of reconstruction. Their determinations must be enforced. They may make mistakes. Doubtless they will; but there must be decision, and decision must be enforced. Under these conditions the United States can not quit. It must go on to the performance of its duty, and the immediate aspect of article 10 is an agreement to do that. I think, therefore, that article 10 should be amended, so that it shall hold a limited time, and thereafter any member may withdraw from it. I annex an amendment to that effect.

The proposed amendment suggested by Mr. Root I will also read:

Add to article 10 the following:

"After the expiration of five years from the signing of this convention any party may terminate its obligation under this article by giving one year's notice in writing to the secretary general of the league."

Inasmuch, however, as the committee reservation seems to have the support of the majority of the Senate, I prefer to offer the suggestion as an amendment to the reservation instead of as an addition to article 10. Moreover, we have passed the period of amendments, and are considering reservations.

Mr. President, the immediate importance of such a change in the proposed reservation lies in its application to the newly created Republics of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Jugo-Slavia. These nations are the immediate offspring of the war; their existence is due very largely to the encouragement and assurances given by the Government of the United States to those subject peoples during our participation in the war, upon the strength of which they revolted and gave material aid to the Allies, and, therefore, contributed in large degree to the successful result of the struggle.

I am convinced that we are under an obligation to these new countries—and I care not whether you call it a legal or a moral one—to contribute to and extend such assistance and protection as they may require during their period of infant growth. Just now, they have hardly emerged from that chrysalis condition which they occupied during the turbulent days immediately following the signing of the armistice; at present their boundaries are ill-defined. The treaty makes provision to make those boundaries more definite. In the meantime they are confronted with racial, domestic, social, and with economic difficulties which are the fertile cause of strife and bloodshed. They are also surrounded by powerful enemies only temporarily disabled, and who will inevitably do everything possible to weaken the cohesive forces of the peoples in those countries, or proceed aggressively to overthrow them and recover their territory just as soon as they feel that they can do so with impunity.

Five years, Mr. President, is a very small period of time in the life of a people and an infinitely small one in the preliminary period of its social and economic expansion. Certainly we have not performed and can not perform our obligation to those countries by merely contenting ourselves with the recognition of their sovereignty, and then leaving them to stand or fall as they may. That might be true were they situated geographically and politically otherwise than they are; but it can not be true under the circumstances with which every Member of the Senate is familiar. The wisdom, therefore, of Mr. Root's suggestion, and which strongly appealed to me at the time it was made, has grown upon me from the hour of its expression; and I am unwilling to vote for a reservation, unless I am obliged to do so, which so restricts the action of this Government under the operation of article 10 of the treaty as to convey to those peoples the discouraging conviction that the United States contents itself with the recognition of their establishment, but washes its hands of all responsibility for their permanent and future growth and welfare.

Certainly, Mr. President, five years is but a small period of time in which those countries can "find" themselves, so to speak; yet it may be long enough to satisfy the people of the United States as to the possibility of their permanent establishment or as to the need for any further support, moral or otherwise, upon our part.

I trust, therefore, Mr. President, that for these reasons, rather crudely stated, the Senate will accept this proposed amendment and add it to the provisions of the third reservation as reported.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate before the vote should be taken upon the amendment which has just been disposed of. I stepped out of the Chamber for luncheon, understanding that a Senator was to address the body at length, when the bell announced that the vote was being taken. I embrace this opportunity to say only a small part of what I would have said if I had had an opportunity to address the Senate before the amendment came to a vote.

When the matter was under consideration a few days ago the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] referring to the purpose which actuated me in introducing the amendment as conjectured by the Senator from Nebraska spoke of that purpose as "Jesuitical." The Jesuits, Mr. President, have done some noble things. Francis Parkman, one of the greatest of American historians, referring to their first appearance in the New World, says:

> Then first were seen in the wilderness of new France the close black cap, the close black robe of the Jesuit father, and the features seamed with study and thought and discipline. Then first did this mighty Proteus, this many-colored Society of Jesus, enter upon that rude field of toil and woe, where, in after years, the devoted zeal of its apostles was to lend dignity to their order and do honor to humanity."

But I apprehend, Mr. President, that the suggestion was not made in keeping with the spirit of this comment of the great historian, reared in New England when the Puritan spirit was dominant there. It was evidently intended to signify some sinister design upon my part, cloaked in what seemed to be an effort to accomplish a good. The same idea seems to have been expressed in a rather cursory way by a contributor to one of the local papers, who said in this morning's issue that the amendment was a trick, the comment of the reporter being as follows:

> The hastily conceived idea of this amendment, which would put administration Senators on record as favoring the most complete method of killing the league of nations, was to draw attention to the drastic character of the Lodge reservation and likewise to break up the so-called "steam-roller" vote which has so far defeated all efforts to frustrate the Lodge program. If the irreconcilables could be won over to support the amendment, the actual Lodge reservation would for the moment be superseded by the amended one, and the administration Senators would then vote against the reservation embodying their own amendment, expecting to carry with them the votes of many Republicans who want American interests more fully protected but do not want to kill the treaty and the covenant altogether.
> The whole plan is therefore admittedly a trick, and neither Senator HITCHCOCK nor Senator WALSH himself has any desire to deceive the opposition into believing that there would be administration support for the amended reservation. But the question of whether it is good policy to indulge in what Senator BORAH calls "child's play" while the whole country waits for action is a matter which may cause the amendment to be withdrawn to-day.

There never was any purpose upon my part to withdraw the amendment, nor was there any trick in the offering of it. The purpose I had in offering the amendment was quite accurately outlined by the Senator from Nebraska, so far as he went. It was my purpose thus to call attention to what I consider a most unfortunate feature of the reservation before us. I offered it for the purpose of preserving what I consider the honor of the United States, and I regard it as quite inconsistent with the honor of the United States to tender to the nations of the earth a reservation which provides for releasing ourselves from the obligation of article 10 while we hold all other nations to it. I desired to call attention to that feature of it.

When the matter came up a few days ago—on Monday, I think—I addressed the Senate upon that subject, but I talked to empty benches. There was not anybody here to listen. I do not believe a dozen Senators heard what I had to say at that time; and I found an opportunity, by offering this amendment, to call the attention of the Senate to that feature of the reservation when Senators were here expecting a vote on it.

But, more than that, Mr. President, regardless of all those conditions and regardless of that purpose, I desired, if I could, to relieve the reservation of this obviously obnoxious feature. What constrained my associates upon this side, after two or three days' deliberation upon the matter, to join with a great number of the Members upon the opposite side in voting against the amendment, I know not; but whatever motives influenced them had no influence upon me. I desired to make the reservation as little objectionable as it could be; and I believed then, and I believe now, that instead of operating to kill the treaty, it would, if these reservations are attached to it, make it more acceptable to the nations of the earth, and make them more ready to agree to the reservations proposed; and thus my purpose was to insure the ultimate adoption and ratification of the treaty, rather than its rejection.

But, Mr. President, I would not have anybody believe that I had any purpose whatever to vote for the reservation, even if my amendment should have carried. I regard it as so obnoxious that I would not vote for it even if the feature to which I directed attention were removed, by the amendment which I proposed or otherwise. Can it be that one who is opposed to a bill here is precluded from offering any amendments at all to it to make it less objectionable to him, upon peril of being accused of perpetrating a trick by offering an amendment to a bill that he does not intend to vote for even if the amendment is adopted? I do not believe anybody can believe that because I had no purpose to vote for the reservation, even if amended, there was anything improper in the tendering of the amendment.

Just another word, Mr. President.

I want to have my position with respect to the matter perfectly understood. I am against any reservations accompanying this ratification at all, and I am against them even though they do not, in my judgment, materially affect the meaning of the treaty, because I have said before that I am entirely convinced that whatever reservations are attached, and however harmless they may be, an opportunity is given to any other nation to withdraw if it cares to do so; that the signing of this treaty and the ratification of it by Germany will be entirely ineffectual if we shall attach reservations to this article of ratification.

I have heretofore adverted to the fact that a treaty is nothing more than a contract between nations, governed generally by exactly the same rules that obtain in respect to private contracts between individuals. With respect to those, the Supreme Court of the United States said, in a case in Fourth Wheaton (Eliason et al v. Henshaw, 4 Wheaton, 225):

> It is an undeniable principle of the law of contracts that an offer of a bargain by one person to another imposes no obligation upon the former until it is accepted by the latter, according to the terms in which the offer was made. Any qualification of, or departure from, those terms invalidates the offer, unless the same be agreed to by the person who made it. Until the terms of the agreement have received the assent of both parties, the negotiation is open and imposes no obligation upon either.

And for the purpose of showing the limit to which that rule is extended, I want to invite your attention to the facts of this particular case. They are recited in the syllabus, as follows:

> Where A offered to purchase of B two or three hundred barrels of flour, to be delivered at Georgetown (D. C.) by the first water, and to pay for the same $9.50 per barrel, and to the letter containing this offer required an answer by the return of the wagon by which the letter was sent. This wagon was at that time in the service of B, and employed by him in conveying flour from his mill to Harpers Ferry, near to which place A then was. His offer was accepted by B in a letter sent by the first regular mail to Georgetown, and received by A at that place; but no answer was ever sent to Harpers Ferry. Held, that this acceptance, communicated at a place different from that indicated by A, imposed no obligation binding upon him.

In this case, as indicated by the recital which I have just made, the proposition was accepted, except that it requested a return by the wagon which carried the offer, and the return was not made in that way, but it was made through the course of mail going to Georgetown, where it was received by the sender. He received it, but it was not sent by the particular way in which he directed that it should be sent; and that was regarded as of sufficient importance to invalidate the contract. In other words, it is expressed otherwise in this way: That it is for the proposer to determine whether any language is important or is unimportant. It is not for the other party. And so in this treaty it is not for us to determine whether the language that we attach is important or is not important. It is for the other party to the contract to whom these changes are proposed to say whether or not they are important.

It is, therefore, for the purpose of holding this treaty as it is, binding Germany to such obligations as she has undertaken by signing and ratifying, that I am opposing any reservations to it. Many of these I should not have the slightest objection to were it not for the consideration which I have stated.

For instance, Mr. President, I should be very glad to vote for the reservation to article 10 proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] some time ago, because it is purely interpretative in character and it interprets article 10 just exactly as I think article 10 should be interpreted; but I am perfectly satisfied that, notwithstanding that fact, if a reservation of that character is attached to the resolution of ratification it gives Germany an opportunity, if she is so disposed, to refuse to accept the ratification, and she thereby becomes released from her signature and her ratification; and we then are placed in a position where we must negotiate a treaty with Germany, abandoning whatever advantages accrued to us by reason of the military victory over her and the coercion that we were able to exert upon her at the time of her signature to the treaty.

Mr. President, this is not a matter of mere willfulness upon the part of those who are opposed to any reservations at all. We are opposing the reservations because of the legal effect which must necessarily follow from these reservations; and it is not only in the case of Germany, but every other nation having ratified the treaty is at liberty in exactly the same way to decline to accept our ratification with the reservations which have been proposed.

I do not care to say anything about the merits. I have said all that I care to. I can not conclude, however, without adding that I regard it as singularly unfortunate that we should be put in the position of proposing to the little, feeble, infantile nations of the earth a proposition of releasing ourselves from the obligation of article 10 while we still hold them to it; and, Mr. President, because we are great, powerful, and strong as we are, and do not really expect that we shall ever call upon them for aid, that is no reason at all why we should decline to say to them, when we ask to be relieved from the obligation of article 10, that we do not intend to hold them to it.

But, Mr. President, what is the fact about the matter? Why are we not here compelled to indulge in the belief that some time or other this country is going to be at war with some of the great nations of the earth?

We hold Great Britain, for instance, obligated under article 10 to come to our aid in case we are involved in war, while we decline to go to her aid. We hold Japan obligated to come to our aid, while we decline to go to hers.

Mr. President, I have heard it said on this floor that this country and the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland will never be at war with each other. I hope most sincerely—I trust in God—that such a catastrophe will never come to our country. But, Mr. President, how can we say it will not come? And if it should, why, Mr. President, should we throw away the opportunity to get aid from other quarters?

Mr. President, the prospect of war with Japan is always held up in the discussions of all of these matters. Why should we decline to make that chance an entirely impossible one, or next to impossible, by getting an agreement with all the nations of the earth that they will join with us if Japan should undertake anything of that kind? If she should, Mr. President, why should we not be glad to have the aid of other countries; but, more particularly, why should we not be glad to have the promise of other countries, which, to my mind, would deter and prevent Japan from any warlike efforts directed toward us?

So, Mr. President, it is not by any means likely, to my mind, that the other nations of the earth will accept this resolution of ratification with this reservation, under which they remain bound to aid us while we escape all obligation to them. In other words, Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that that will be an obstacle to the acceptance of our ratification, and will result in its rejection by some of the great powers enumerated in the first reservation which has been proposed here, and which the Senate some days ago adopted.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator opened his statement, but I understand that he referred to a word that I used a few days ago in the debate characterizing the amendment which the Senate just voted down—that is, characterizing it in connection with the explanation of it as given by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The Senator from Montana offered the reservation that has just been voted down, and I stated that I had been prepared to vote for it until hearing the explanation as to why it was offered—its purpose—as made by the leader on the other side, the Senator from Nebraska, and in characterizing it I used the word "Jesuitical." I used it intelligently, to convey the meaning that I had in mind.

I understand "Jesuitical" to mean following the practice of the Jesuits. I understand "Jesuitry" in some cases to convey the ordinary meaning which I attached to it, which I intended, which I understand to be—

Subtle or dissembling arguments or practices, as the practice of mental reservation, action on the principle that the end justifies the means.

After listening to the explanation made by the Senator from Nebraska of the amendment, I used the term "Jesuitical" in explaining it, and I used it in exactly the sense that it is used in the dictionary, not intending it as any opprobrious epithet, of course, to be hurled at the Senator, but simply as characterizing the practice of offering an amendment to a reservation, with a mental reservation, or for some other purpose than that generally understood, with the intent to dissemble the true purpose—that is, not with the intent to have the reservation in good faith adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Lenroot	Reed

Gronna	La Follette	Ransdell	Wolcott

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] read, so as to show how the reservation would read if so amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposes the following amendment to the proposed reservation of the committee, No. 3, as follows:

On page 2, line 4, after the word "obligation," insert the following words:

Beyond the expiration of five years from the ratification of this treaty.

So that if amended it will read:

3. The United States assumes no obligation beyond the expiration of five years from the ratification of this treaty to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

And so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in substance that is the recommendation made by ex-Senator Root, and it seems to me it is the least thing that the American Republic can do to make good, at least for five years, the results of the victory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that ex-Senator Root withdrew that later, and advised the complete extirpation of article 10. I hope we can have a vote upon the amendment, on which I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called.) In the absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY], who is detained on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. If my colleague were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. In his absence I withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator for the day, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who are detained on public business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina. In his absence I withdraw my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will rend the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed reservation No. 3 the following:

Provided, however, That the United States assumes for the period of five years, with other members of the league, the obligation of said article 10 as to the following Republics, to wit: Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I will say simply that the difference between this amendment and the one just disposed of lies in this, that under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] the obligation of article 10 would extend to all members of the league for the period of five years—Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and so forth——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. While under the amendment now before the Senate the obligation would be restricted to those Republics created out of enemy territory, and particularly those Republics created as buffer States to Germany and Austria.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he knows what the boundaries of Czechoslovakia are?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. LENROOT. Can the Senator inform the Senate what are the boundaries of Czechoslovakia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The boundaries are provided for by the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Have they been fixed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are provided for in the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Have they been fixed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think not. What difference would it make upon the obligation where they are?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana about the effect of his amendment. Does the Senator want to assume these obligations without any action of Congress? Is that the intention of his amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My opinion is that we assume the obligation without any action of Congress. We could not engage in war to carry out or fulfill the obligation without a declaration of war by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to get the Senator's judgment on what seems to me to be the legal effect of his amendment. As I look at it, unless it is held that we are going to assume the obligation without any action of Congress, it does not add anything to the reservation, because as the reservation now stands we can take any action with regard to the particular nations named or any others if Congress provides for doing so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly that is what this reservation is intended for. It is intended, as I understand it, to destroy the obligation of article 10, except that Congress may in a particular case assume the obligation or not, as it sees fit, which, of course——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator's amendment change that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. Which, of course, it is at liberty to do now without any obligation.

Mr. NORRIS. Then what good does the Senator's amendment do? It seems to me if that is the construction he places upon it, it can not have any effect whatever. It is already in there if Congress shall act. If Congress does not act——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has not really reflected upon it if that is the view he takes of it. Article 10 obligates us to preserve as against external aggression the political independence and territorial integrity of every other member. The proposed reservation utterly destroys that obligation. It provides that the United States assumes no obligation, except that whenever the question comes up Congress will determine whether they will assume an obligation or not assume an obligation. This, however, takes the three States out from under that reservation and leaves the obligation of article 10, whatever it may be, operative in favor of those three States as against us.

Mr. NORRIS. Then if the Senator's amendment were agreed to, under the construction he gives it, and if we adopted his amendment and approved the treaty with that in it, the President would have authority without any act of Congress to take the Army of the United States to Europe, if necessary, in any controversy in regard to the territorial integrity of the particular nations named.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By no means.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator's amendment has no effect whatever.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall endeavor to make this so plain that even the Senator from Nebraska must comprehend it.

We have a treaty with the Republic of Panama under which we guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of that Republic; but suppose that Costa Rica should endeavor to make war upon Panama. The President of the United States has no right to use the Army and Navy of the United States to make war on Costa Rica without a declaration of war by Congress. If Costa Rica should undertake to make war upon Panama we are obligated to go to Panama's rescue, but we can not make war until Congress makes a declaration of war. The President of the United States would be subject to impeachment, in my estimation, if he made war upon Costa Rica without a previous declaration of war.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In just a moment. When the question comes before Congress as to whether it will make a declaration of war or not, the only question that is properly addressed to Congress is, Have we agreed by our treaty to make war? So if we attach this qualification to the reservation and any nation should make war upon any one of these three Republics it would be simply a question then as to whether we had agreed to go to their aid. We do not enter into a question of the merits or demerits of the war; we go to their help. We make a declaration of war under which the President of the United States would command the Army and Navy for the purpose of protecting them.

I yield now to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if, under article 10 as it stands in the covenant, there is any discretion on the part of Congress to fulfill the treaty obligation to protect and preserve the territorial boundaries, and so forth? I should like to ask him a further question: If he admits that there is any discretion or judgment on the part of Congress to fulfill that obligation, is he not destroying the binding force of the obligation? And is not all this discussion about the obligation arising under article 10, when once it is admitted that the fulfillment of that obligation rests in the discretion or judgment of Congress, a mere matter of a form of words, and hence is it not immaterial whether we take the Senator's construction of article 10 or the construction of article 10 in the reservation? It is manifest that if once you admit the element of judgment, of discretion, or expediency into the fulfillment of a binding obligation you destroy the obligation.

To be sure, you can not compel Congress to observe the obligation, but Congress is just as much bound to fulfill a treaty obligation as to carry out any other lawful contract which any department of the Government has entered into. You can not escape the obligation of article 10 as it stands in the covenant originally by saying that Congress has the power to declare war. Congress is under the obligation to carry out the terms of a valid treaty under the treaty-making power of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has stated my attitude with respect to this matter better than I could state it myself. We are entirely at one about it. There would be no discretion at all on the part of Congress in that event. If Costa Rica invades Panama, we do not consider the question of discretion at all; we are bound to declare war against Costa Rica. On the other hand, if we did not have a treaty of that character, if we had not bound ourselves to protect the territorial integrity and the political independence of Panama, and Colombia should endeavor to make war upon Panama, we would regard that as being perilous to our interest; but we would be under no obligation to go in. Congress would then consider the advisability of going in as an independent proposition entirely; and so here.

I want to write this document so that the people of these new States will be under no doubt whatever as to what Congress will do; so that they will be assured that Congress will carry out the solemn obligation of this country and declare war in the premises. More than that, Mr. President, I desire to have it known by Germany that if she undertakes to invade any of these infant Republics the United States stands back of them; I desire to have it understood that if Russia should be desirous of attacking any one of these countries she will understand that the United States will stand back of them and protect them for the period—for the brief period—of five years, until they can get upon their feet; and that those countries may know that it will not be a question then as to what is the advisable thing to do, as it shall appear at some future time, nor will the question be subjected to propaganda in this country either one way or the other. They know that the United States will observe the obligation which she here undertakes and will declare war in order that their territorial integrity may be protected in accordance with the covenant.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just one word further.

The merits of this matter have been quite adequately exposed to the Senate by the eloquent Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in discussing his amendment a few moments ago. I merely desire to supplement what he stated by quoting from an address by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who interrogated me a short time ago, which he delivered to the Senate under date July 17, 1919, in which he said:

> The storm center of these reservations seems to be article 10. As to the retention of this article, much may be said on both sides. It may be argued that the United States ought not to bind itself for all time to guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league against external aggression, and yet that argument might not apply with the same force to protecting the territorial settlements made by the peace conference until this new world order is fully established and the present peace of the world made secure.

It is in order to carry out the idea thus expressed by the Senator from Rhode Island that I have tendered this amendment, extending for the brief period of five years the obligation of the United States to these countries which have been created by the treaty of peace.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, now that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has made his amendment so plain that I think nobody understands it, I hope we may have a vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in reference to the pending subject before we come to a vote.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I have never heard a more powerful nor a more convincing argument than that of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]; but I want to ask him and all other Democratic Senators a question. Is there a Democratic Senator who now believes that any argument that can possibly be made will alter the predetermination that our antagonists have agreed upon? Therefore, why waste time? I appeal on behalf of the American people for action, and early action; to vote the treaty up or vote it down, and stop this talk, which every man who will think knows will not change a vote in this Senate on this treaty.

Let me say to my party, if we have failed to this date to make plain our own position, surely we never can do it. So we are wasting the time of the Republic, we are doing nothing, we are making mud pies. Why may we not keep our mouths shut and simply vote, vote, and only vote. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Arizona spoke; I am glad he did not remain silent, because he made a very good point. This debate has not been delayed by short speeches of 10 and 15 minutes; this debate has been prolonged by speeches lasting hours and days; and, so far as we who are supporting the treaty are concerned, our skirts are clear and our consciences are clean. The record shows, as I have made it up for the months of September and October, that the time consumed by the friends of the treaty and the opponents of the treaty is as 37 for the supporters of the treaty and 98 for the opponents of the treaty, and much of the 98 has been consumed simply for the purpose of delay.

What I am about to say, Mr. President, will delay the Senate only a few minutes. What I charge is that it will be a rank repudiation of a moral obligation if we fail to include in the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts an assurance to the Bohemians, an assurance to the Poles, an assurance to the people of the Jugo-Slav State that we will at least for five years protect these little Republics by our promise after having brought them into being.

I refer for a moment to what the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] said. He wants to know whether mere words have any good effect in this guaranty. I say they have; I say those words mean a great deal to the German Empire. They mean, if we adopt them, that Germany will know that she can not crush these little Republics and attempt to reincorporate them into the German Empire. I say, if we refuse by a vote to do that, Germany is advised that we do not propose to stand by Great Britain and France in maintaining these little Republics; it is an invitation to Germany to crush out their life. I say it is a repudiation of our moral obligation. I say it is running away from something which we promised to do.

Mr. President, unwilling to detain the Senate further, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, certain statements made by Senators in support of what I now maintain and what they now propose to repudiate—that is, that we should stand by the little Republics which we induced to take up arms, and which we are morally bound to support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, why can not the Senator read them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am trying to save the time of the Senate; but, if unanimous consent is refused, I shall read them.

Mr. FALL. I object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well, I shall read them. On September 17, 1918, the Senator from Massachusetts said——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I call the attention of the country to the fact that it is a Democratic Senator who is now delaying a vote on the treaty.

Mr. MOSES. And may I add, Mr. President, the Democratic leader.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On September 17, 1918, speaking in the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said:

The soldiers of that people—

That is, the Bohemians—

a hundred thousand prisoners—were allowed by the Bolsheviki a free passage to France with their arms. Then, of course, the Bolsheviki broke the promise and undertook to disarm them. We all know what happened, a wonderful history; there has been nothing like it in all the past except the famous march of the 10,000 Greeks. When the Bolsheviki attempted to take their arms from them they proceeded to fight; they defeated the people who tried to stop their way, and they took town after town. Now, they are backed up by the allied forces from the United States, from Japan, from England, and from France. They have brought habitable Siberia, that vast country, very nearly under their control—a great feat. If any nation ever deserved recognition as a belligerent, it is the Czecho-Slovaks.

But, Mr. President, it can not stop there; it will not stop there. We must recognize the Jugo-Slavs, at the head of whom stands Serbia, which has suffered more than any other country in this war, with the sole exception of Belgium. We must also recognize the Poles, one of the greatest and most brilliant people of history. They alone can make a great and powerful State in central Europe, which will forever bar the eastern movement of Germany. That is coming; that is involved in the recognition of the Jugo-Slavs.

What does all this mean? It means that when the President recognized the Czecho-Slovaks as a belligerent nation he set his hand irrevocably to a document which meant the dissolution of the Austrian Empire—"a consummation devoutly to be wished." If Bohemia is to be independent, the most important part, economically and industrially, of Austria is taken away. But it must not stop there. The Slav races, 26,000,000 of whom Austria holds and holds oppressively, must be set free and given independence; and the President has entered upon that great policy most wisely, as I believe.

Later on the Senator said:

She—

Speaking of Germany—

shall not now resort to talk and bargain for a decision. We mean to put her in physical bonds. We mean to make the world safe for all free, law-abiding, decent people, so that they may live their lives in peace, unthreatened and unalarmed. For this we fight. We shall not ask more. We shall never accept less.

In another speech, which the Senator from Massachusetts delivered in December of the same year—a speech which has already been somewhat read from by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]—the Senator from Massachusetts went further, and declared that it was the duty of the United States to join Great Britain, France, and Italy in preserving and maintaining those little republics in the independence which we proposed to give them. The Senator from Massachusetts then talked long and loud on the importance of the United States standing with Great Britain, with France, and with Italy to that end; and now the Senator comes in here and in his reservation proposes to repudiate the obligation that he then declared we should assume.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer, but I declare that if we refuse to guarantee independence to those little republics which we brought into existence, if we propose to run away and leave Great Britain, France, and Italy alone to guarantee their independence, even for five years, we repudiate a moral obligation and we do something which is unworthy of a great Republic.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator know whether these States, or either of them, have accepted the provisions embraced in this treaty that they were to accept before they are recognized?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no knowledge on that subject, and I do not consider it of any importance.

Mr. FALL. I supposed that the Senator did not, Mr. President. One of the obligations which these States must directly accept is that they will assure this country, among others, that they will protect racial and religious minorities. The Senator has no information upon it. My information is that these smaller States have all refused to enter into treaties of that character.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if there is a desire to vote, I will waive any remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to reservation numbered 3, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee. On that the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement I made on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote. I will let the announcement stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Making the same announcement that I made a while ago in regard to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce again the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 44, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

THE SECRET TEATRIES—THE NEW MAP OF EUROPE AND OUR OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE 10.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I propose to state as briefly as possible some of the obligations, in so far as we are permitted to know them, which the United States is called upon to assume under the terms of this treaty and the league compact, and particularly article 10, which is before the Senate at this time. I shall limit myself at this time to a discussion of those obligations alone which are imposed by so much of the treaty as deals with the distribution of spoils to allied powers other than Great Britain.

We have already paid a fearful price for our participation in the late war. It has cost us the lives of more than 50,000 of our finest young men slain in battle, and over 200,000 maimed and wounded, and many thousands of others who lost their lives through disease growing out of the war. It has cost us some thirty billions of dollars, most of which still remains to be wrung from our people—principal and interest—by heart-breaking taxes which must be paid by this and succeeding generations. It has cost us the friendship of great nations, with whose people our national desires, as well as our national interests, require close and friendly association. I do not refer here merely to the people of Germany and Austria, but to those of Russia and possibly China as well.

One of the first results of the President's policy in attempting to form alliances with European Governments has been to make us a party either active or passive to the robbery of China under the much-discussed Shantung provisions of this treaty.

Another result of the President's policy, as foolish as it is illegal, by which our Government has sent soldiers and munitions into Russia to be used in assisting one of the warring factions there against another, is that whichever faction eventually wins, we will have earned the hatred and contempt of both.

As a result of this war also our domestic concerns are in as sorry a plight as our foreign affairs. On the pretense that they were necessary as war measures, the forces of reaction have succeeded in passing one law after another destroying freedom of speech and of the press and immunity from unlawful search and seizure, until at this hour the substance of civil liberty is destroyed in this country. While most of the legislation of which I speak was confined by its terms to the period of the war, bills have been prepared and are now pending in Congress by which these same repressive measures are to be made applicable to times of peace as well as war.

I shall show before I get through that if we ever become a member of this proposed league of nations we will be perpetually in a state of war, so that no new principle will need to be invoked in order to suppress any publication offensive to the administration, or to imprison any citizen whose criticism of the Government is offensive to Federal officeholders.

We have as a result of this war aroused in this country bitternesses and class hatred which threaten at any time to break out into disorder and violence. By this war, as by all wars, a favored few profited immensely, while the great mass of the people suffered immeasurably. Available reports seem to indicate that 20,000 new millionaires were made in the United States as a result of this war. That is just about one millionaire created for every three boys who lost their lives in France. While the ever-mounting cost of the necessaries of life brings home to the common man as never before the problem of making a decent living, the profiteers of the war brazenly flaunt before the public their new-made wealth. Is it any wonder that labor is dissatisfied and discontented; that strikes, the most extensive in all the history of our country, are existing and impending; that discontent is everywhere; that even our form of government as ordained and established by the Constitution is perhaps threatened?

What I have enumerated, Mr. President, only suggests what the war has cost us, and what it will cost us in money, suffering, and in human life. But all this, sir, we knew, or should have known, we would have to pay as the price of our participation in this war, all of the things I have enumerated; and those who voted for war should have voted for war with that in the account to be reckoned with.

Every Senator when he cast his vote for war knew that it meant the things I have mentioned. This much we contracted for when we entered the war. And, sir, these are the burdens which the mass of people of this country must bear, and a part of which must be passed on to succeeding generations. No one doubts that we are strong enough and resourceful enough to pay in full our war debts; and if we go our way in peace, we will in time be able to restore our country to normal conditions. We can never bring back the lives that were sacrificed; we can never restore the maimed and wounded to health. The hearts broken through this war we can never heal; the suffering it has entailed we can never recall; and all that we knew we bargained for when we entered the war.

But, sir, there is one thing which is now demanded of us that we did not bargain for when we entered this war, and that is the surrender of our right to control our own destiny as a Nation.

After all, Mr. President, that is what membership in this proposed league of nations is to cost us. Up until the present time we are still free to travel the road which the founders of our Government intended us to travel. We are still free to fulfill the destiny for which we are fitted by the genius of our people, the character of our institutions, our great resources, and our fortunate geographical position. All this we are asked to surrender in order to become a member of this league of nations. We are asked to emasculate, if not destroy, our form of government by recognizing the right of some assembly or council of nations, in which we have small voice, to interfere with our most vital concerns. We are asked to place our resources, not only our wealth, but the lives of our people, at the disposal of Governments and peoples in the remote sections of the earth and to uphold there policies foreign to the purposes and desires of our own people. We are asked to depart from the traditional policy which our position on the American Continent has enabled us to pursue of keeping free from entangling alliances of European politics, and to become a party to every political scheme that may be hatched in the capitals of Europe or elsewhere in this world of ours.

This, Mr. President, is something that no one contemplated when we entered the war, and I do not believe that one vote in favor of the war would have been cast in the Congress of the United States if it had been understood that such a result would follow our participation in the war.

Now, let us examine more closely and somewhat in detail the obligations we are called upon to assume if we vote ourselves into this league of nations. Everyone understands and concedes that by article 10 of the covenant we undertake, when we become a member of the league, to protect and preserve the political and territorial status quo of all members of the league of nations as against any external aggression.

By article 11, as I shall attempt to show, we undertake substantially the same obligation where the status quo is threatened by revolution.

For the present, however, it is sufficient to consider our obligations under article 10. I am not going to stop to quibble about reservations, mild or drastic, or the methods by which our obligations are to be enforced. If we enter this league we must assume the responsibility that goes with membership in it. If we are not going to be bound by the obligations which go with membership in the league, then the only honest thing to do is to keep out of it. The language of article 10 leaves nothing to construction. It is at least one thing about this league that is perfectly clear. That article provides:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

Now, either we are going to do that, specifically that thing, or we are not going to do it. If we are not going to do it, we have no business in the league. We can not promise to preserve political independence and territorial integrity of some members and not of others. We can not promise to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league on some occasions and refuse to do it on other occasions. We can not be permitted to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of a member of the league when it is to our interest to do so and seek to destroy the political independence or territorial integrity of a member of the league when it is to our interest to take that course. Such action on the part of the members of the league would destroy the whole plan and purpose of the league. It would at once reduce it to a mere aggregation of warring factions and petty alliances, in which every dispute submitted to the league would beget as many others as there are members of the league. I assume that if we go into the league we go into it with the honest intention of fulfilling our obligation to preserve the political and territorial status quo created by the peace conference at Paris.

AUSTRIA.

Now, let us see what that obligation involves. We will consider the simplest situation first, which is that presented by Austria.

I recall to your mind in this connection the language of the President on December 4, 1918, in an address to the Congress. He then said:

> We owe it, however, to ourselves to say that we do not wish in any way to impair or rearrange the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

I have no doubt that the President used this language in the utmost good faith. At that time he had not been to Paris, where he has told us he first learned of the secret treaties, and he says when he arrived in Paris he was still ignorant of the designs and purposes of the Allies.

I pause at this time to direct attention to the fact that this is the most remarkable statement made to the Committee on Foreign Relations when it visited the White House at the request of the President. The secret treaties had been published broadcast in November, 1917. They had been published in full in pamphlet form and distributed by the New York Evening Post. Columns upon columns on the front page of the Post and other great newspapers in America had carried all of the covenants of those secret treaties shortly after they were published in Russia by the Lenin government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was it not generally known in the United States through cable dispatches, both Italian cables and French cables?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, Mr. President, it was not only generally known in the United States, it was not only spread at large upon the front pages of all the great papers of this country, but it was discussed in all the parliaments of the world. It was discussed day after day. There were more than 40 allusions to it in the British Parliament during that time. The ministry was put to answer questions respecting these secret treaties day after day, and it is a matter of record in the parliamentary debates of Great Britain that Balfour said that the President was fully informed regarding them.

I pass that, Mr. President, because he said to the Committee on Foreign Relations that he did not know anything about them until he arrived in Paris in December, 1918, or January, 1919. But, sir, for more than two years the public prints of the country and the parliamentary debates of the world had teemed with discussion and publication regarding the secret treaties made between the allied powers for the distribution of the territory of Europe and Asia and Africa that we are asked to ratify in the treaty which is now pending before the Senate.

Let me say this, further, that a study of the terms of those secret treaties and of the treaty that is pending here now and of such other information as we have been able to secure with regard to other treaties shows that the work of the Paris conference, held behind closed doors at Versailles, pursued not the terms of the armistice but utterly disregarded the terms of the armistice and followed line by line the boundaries fixed in the secret treaties that had been made in 1916 and 1917.

If he was ignorant, he was the only man connected in any way with public life in the United States who was ignorant of the terms and purposes of the secret treaties.

Prior to the war the Austro-Hungarian Empire contained 251,000 square miles and a population of 51,000,000 people. The Paris conference has divided it into five separate and independent States, to wit, Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Jugo-Slavia, sometimes called the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and Poland.

Austria, as whittled down by the Paris conference, now has a population of about 5,500,000, and an area of about 45,000 square miles, Hungary an area of about 55,000 square miles and a population of about 8,000,000, Czechoslovakia an area of about 60,000 square miles and a population of about 13,000,000—10,500,000 are Czechoslovakians and 2,500,000 are Germans—the Serb-Croat-Slovene State has about 90,000 square miles and a population of from 12,000,000 to 13,000,000. Its boundaries are still in dispute. To Poland is allotted an area containing about 125,000 square miles and a population of 36,000,000.

That this grotesque partition of the Austro-Hungarian Empire was not made on the principles of nationality is obvious. For example, Poland, before her partition in 1772, had an area of 274,000 square miles. She is allotted under the Paris conference one-half of this territory. Czechoslovakia is given control over 2,500,000 Germans, while the Tyrol, inhabited by pure German stock, is taken from Austria and given to Italy.

Roumania also comes in for her share of the former Austrian Empire, and, not satisfied with the amount of spoils awarded her by the Paris conference, has marched her armies into the capital of Budapest, which she holds now in defiance of the Allies and the league of nations.

Lord Bryce, one of the most learned and distinguished living Englishmen, in an article in the Manchester Guardian, which was copied by the Literary Digest of July 6, 1919, said:

> What appears to be now demanded is the cession to Italy of more than 200,000 Tyrolese (as a matter of fact, it is about 300,000) who have never been Italian in any sense, and who do not wish to be transferred to Italian rule. What is to be said of this demand for the annexation of more than 200,000 Tyrolese, an honest, simple, industrious race of peasants, as those of us who have climbed their cliffs and peaks know them to be? It was their misfortune and not their fault that they were dragged into a wicked war by a group of unscrupulous politicians surrounding an imbecile monarch. How can such a demand be reconciled with the principles of nationality and self-determination of peoples which the Allies proclaimed as the principles for which they were fighting?

Mr. REED. May I inquire if the language just read by the Senator from Wisconsin is his language or the language of Mr. Bryce?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is the language of Mr. Bryce that I am quoting.

Mr. REED. I was interested to know.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is directly quoted from an interview which he gave to the Manchester Guardian, a most conservative statement from a most conservative man.

And in an interview published in the press of this country on November 1, 1919, Lord Bryce discussed the same subject. I quote from the interview, as follows:

> Under the treaty signed with the little bit of Austria which remained, he said, 280,000 Tyrolese were taken and handed over to Italy. He said he had searched in vain for the reason for this action, but could find none, although it was totally opposed to the doctrine of nationality. The Italian Government said it wanted the Tyrolese territory for strategic purposes, Lord Bryce said; but, he declared, they could not want it for that purpose against a virtually bankrupt State of only 6,000,000 persons.

Now, I am citing these outrageous violations of every principle of ethnology and racial alignment because they bear upon the obligations that we are to assume under article 10. What this league decrees done, we must enforce by armies, by soldiers, by the boys raised in South Dakota, in Wisconsin, in Pennsylvania, in New Jersey, and elsewhere; and if the Paris conference violated every principle upon which nationalities are aligned, if they violated every obligation of the principles laid down as we fought this war step by step, shall we not, if we vote to enter this league, have an accounting with our constituents that ought to give us pause and make us hesitate to take this step?

There is, of course, no pretense of supporting the award of Transylvania to Roumania—a territory substantially as large as Roumania itself—on any principle of nationality. The explanation of all this, of course, lies—here we come to it—in the secret treaties.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of argument here to-day to the effect that if we did not enter into article 10 we would place these small countries—Jugo-Slavia, Czechoslovakia, the Serbian State—at the mercy of Germany, as though under this covenant we were only to protect against aggression by Germany. In the opinion of the Senator, are we not obliged to protect them against attack, even by each other or the efforts of one people to recover its own sovereignty?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, the Senator from Missouri states the proposition exactly as I see it. The four or five gentlemen who sat in secret conclave at Versailles, regardless of the ethical principles enunciated by President Wilson along the lines of which peace ought to be wrought out in a treaty, throwing all of that into the wastebasket, constructed the obligation which we are required to ratify here upon the lines of secret treaties that had been made for the benefit of the different members that they were bribing by territory to join the Allies.

Italy was induced to violate her treaty with the Central Powers and go in with the Allies by the secret treaty which was made and which is known as the treaty of London. The treaty of peace consummated at Versailles, in which we are asked to concur, has no regard for nationality; no regard for the will of subject peoples; no regard for ethnological lines; no regard for racial attractions or racial repulsions. It is made on the hard-and-fast lines of the secret treaties entered into for the purposes of the war in the period 1915 to 1918.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that the treaty has no regard for several things; but does he not think it has a very profound regard for race and national cupidity and grasping?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; it does. I concede, Mr. President, that it appeals in a certain way to selfish interests and mercenary designs and purposes; but to the lines upon which the boundaries of nationality can be laid down and maintained without perpetual hostility and antagonism it is utterly indifferent.

The explanation of all this, of course, lies in the secret treaties by which the Allies bribed Roumania and Italy to join them in the war, while Serbia, of course, is also given a choice bit of Hungarian territory. It is well to recall, while speaking of Hungary, that her repeated and heroic attempts to free herself from the domination of the Hapsburg monarchy, including that of 1848 under the leadership of Kossuth, were only defeated by the action of those countries, or some of them, who were allies in the late war. The testimony taken before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate establishes the absolute falsity of any claim that the principle of nationality or self-determination controlled in the partition of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Dr. Sekely, one of our most distinguished citizens of Austro-Hungarian descent, in his testimony before that committee—that is, the Committee on Foreign Relations—on September 2, 1919, which, I venture to say, few, if any, Members of the Senate have read, after pointing out that the action of the Paris peace conference violated and outraged every principle of self-determination and nationality of the people abroad, said:

> This "league of injustice" intends to build an impregnable and indestructible Chinese wall around the subjugated races, a wall so high as to shut out all rays of hope for liberation, a wall so strong through the united cooperation of the mightiest nations of the earth as to imbue the peoples which had been caught in the diplomatic net of the Paris peace conference, as the Hungarians—or else had been ignored by it, as the Irish—with the paralyzing knowledge of their utter impotency to escape and to be free again. Instead of joy it brings sorrow, instead of light it sheds darkness, instead of righting wrongs it commits new ones, instead of developing international law it makes the law of egotism international, instead of heralding the dawn of a new world it means the doom of all the highest aspirations of mankind toward universal justice, fairness, and a square deal.

It does all that with a deceiving smile and with an abundance of hypocritically sweet words.

We must remember, Mr. President, that it is this condition we undertake to uphold and perpetuate when we become a member of this league. This situation is well stated by the celebrated newspaper writer, Mr. Frank H. Simonds, in the London Times of June 2 last. I quote from that interview:

In sum, it is essential for Americans to recognize that, so far as the peace of the world is concerned, the Austrian settlement is even more important than the German, and that the possibilities of permanent adjustment are far less numerous. Actually the war, by destroying the central authority of the Hapsburg monarchy, has released races whose rivalries are at least a thousand years old. These races are as unwilling to submit their claims to the final decision of the league of nations as were the Balkan races to subordinate theirs to the will of the concert of Europe. However the boundaries may be drawn, hundreds of thousands of people will, in the nature of things, be subjected to a rule they will not recognize. Germans will be placed under Slavs, Slavs under Italians, Hungarians under Roumanians, Poles under Ukrainians, and Ukrainians under Poles, and such a situation can only lead to new crises.

We, sir, if we become a member of this league of nations, assume the obligation of standing guard over this territory, with all its rivalries and hatreds and its petty and artificial governments brought into existence by the mere word of the two or three men who controlled the Paris conference.

I have spoken of the secret treaties and their effect upon the dismemberment and destruction of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, but even after Roumania, Italy, and Serbia had been satiated with new territory there was left an area extensive enough and a population sufficiently large to have made up a substantial State.

Great Britain's interests in the Far East, however, required this territory should be made into buffer States, and this was done in the manner stated. We all recall, as one of the causes of the war, the rivalry between Germany and Great Britain for trade in the Far East, and the efforts of Germany through the Bagdad Railway to tap the great resources of that vast country, and how she had been thwarted in her purpose temporarily at least at the time the war began in 1914.

President Wilson very frankly stated the truth in his St. Louis speech on September 5 last when he said:

What was the old formula of Pan Germanism? From Bremen to Bagdad, wasn't it? Well, look at the map. What lies between Bremen and Bagdad? After you get past the German territory there is Poland, there is Bohemia, which we have made into Czechoslovakia; there is Hungary, which is now divided from Austria and does not share Austria's strength; there is Roumania; there is Jugo-Slavia; there is broken Turkey; and then Persia and Bagdad. We have undertaken to say this route is closed.

There you have the second of the causes of Austria's dismemberment and destruction. It was that the road leading to England's vast possessions in the Far East might be closed to any other country. To accomplish this purpose these petty and arbitrary States have been raised up, and we are going to underwrite their political independence and territorial integrity for the benefit of Great Britain.

I quote from one more English authority before passing from this point. I refer to the article by Austin Harrison in the English Review of July, 1919:

A hundred years ago Napoleon cast and recast the map as he pleased, but he displaced merely principalities; the economic life of the peoples concerned was left untouched, and of nationality in Europe there was little to dismember. But to-day national dislocations imply economic disturbances, which in their reactions are international in incidence, for capital and credit are to-day international, whereas in Napoleon's time neither the one nor the other played even a part.

That is where at Paris the "big three" have foundered. In their desire to humiliate, annihilate, and grab they have economically weakened Europe; they have set up artificial economic units; they have pursued a policy of leveling down, taking advantage of Russia's eclipse. The results are these:

Europe, east of the Rhine, is to consist of lacerated and impoverished center units flanked by weak and doubtful economic units, who in turn are to remain armed, while the center units are to disarm. This, of course, was Napoleon's policy always; it has been scrupulously followed in Paris. Yet with this difference: The dislocations to-day are economic; therefore the reactions will be economic. Now, this must mean a poor and vitally weakened economic Europe, with a greatly reduced purchasing power and a low export potentiality. The effects of this will be widely felt. All States, big and small, will in consequence be dissatisfied, restless, a congeries of brooding ambitions and anachronisms. As all Europe is insolvent and the economic mechanism of credit depends upon Britain, we shall perforce assume the rôle of Europe's janitor, and Europe will be our white Egypt. To imagine that we can afford that luxury for long is to imagine a vain thing. To assume that Europe will consent for long to remain the economic vassal of the capitalists of Paris and London is to ignore history. A stricken, chaotic, impoverished, and infuriated Europe must react disastrously upon the world's markets and particularly on our own, must react disadvantageously upon credit, must therefore still further strike at the tenuous foundations of the world's mechanism.

It is also true, as the writer later points out, that an impoverished and infuriated Europe is also a revolutionary and a war-like Europe. And this is the Europe created by the Paris conference which we are to police.

I have dwelt at some length on the destruction and dismemberment of Austria, because it is characteristic of everything done at the Paris conference. Starting out with the declaration of President Wilson that the Austrian Empire was not going to be impaired or even rearranged, we find that it is utterly destroyed for the most sordid and selfish purposes, and that a condition has been created which is absolutely certain to keep central Europe in turmoil and war for years to come.

While the Austrian treaty has never been placed before the Senate, it has been printed, and we can speak with some degree of certainty of its provisions. It is a remarkable fact, Mr. President, that the treaty with Germany which we are now considering is only a fragment of the settlement concluded at Paris. Five major treaties were drafted by the Paris conference—that with Germany, and the treaties with Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. The treaty with Turkey is not yet completed. Each, I understand, is interwoven with the other.

These treaties have been described by President Wilson as intertwining. As Secretary Lansing said before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate—I should like to have Senators think of this for a moment—as Secretary Lansing said, the full engagements in which the United States may be involved can not be determined until we get full texts of the treaties.

Does the Senate realize that it has not the full texts of these treaties, and that we are asked to subscribe to an obligation incorporated within the league of nations that binds us to carry out all of the provisions of all the treaties that have been made? We do not know what is in the other treaties, aside from the one that has been presented, the treaty with Germany. We have had an unofficial copy of the treaty with Austria.

I can not quite understand, Mr. President, the standards of the present Senate. I do not believe that there is a man here who is a lawyer who, if employed by a client to advise him with regard to the making of a contract, would permit his client to sign his name to a contract only a part of the obligations of which were stated in the document which he signed; and yet that is exactly what we are asked to do and what we are proceeding to do. We know nothing about these other treaties, or the obligations which the league of nations compels us to carry out with respect to them. They have not been submitted to us. We know nothing about the mandatories, or the arrangements that are being made, day by day and hour by hour, by the representatives of the different Governments at Paris, now in session, that impose obligations which we must carry out and back up with troops and money, and send soldiers to fight and die to preserve. And yet we go on complacently, ready to set our hands to a document that shall bind the people of this Government with regard to covenants about which we can know absolutely nothing. Not one of us, as a responsible lawyer dealing with a client, would do a thing of that kind any more than he would cut off his arm.

What does it mean? It means that the Senate of the United States has been recreant to its traditions. You may smile, but if we could turn the clock back a generation of time the President of the United States, when he sent down the German treaty and covenant, withholding the other treaties, would have been informed that it would not be considered for a moment until the Senate of the United States had on the table all of the obligations that the league of nations carried with it, that they might know about them, and that they might in their trust capacity, in binding the American people, act intelligently.

I say that the present Senate is derelict in its duty, and has failed to discharge its responsibility to the American people by permitting itself to be coerced into the consideration of a contract more than one-half of which is blank, and is being forced to sign that contract without knowing the obligations that will be written into the blank places when the other treaties, the mandatories, and the protectorates are worked out by those who are engaged in that business in Paris now.

Why is it that these things have been held back from us? Why is it that the President of the United States did not transmit with these treaties the minutes of the Paris conference? They have been asked for. They have been denied. Neither the Committee on Foreign Relations nor the Senate has been permitted to know the discussion that took place when the different provisions in the German treaty and the league of nations were set down and agreed upon. That discussion would help to enlighten us. We have had days and days of debate here to determine what certain provisions of this covenant mean. If we could have had the debate that took place behind the doors of the conference at Versailles, it would have shed some light upon the meaning of these obscure provisions. Every Senator knows that, as to the Constitution of the United States, when the Madison papers, the minutes that were kept of the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, were published they threw a flood of light upon the provisions of the Constitution; and we all of us go back, in obscure passages of the Constitution, in conflicting or doubtful meanings there, to the debates and to the minutes of the Constitutional Convention.

In God's name, Mr. President, what sort of a body has this become?

I undertake to say that if Webster, or Thurman, or Edmunds, men of that stamp and that generation, were Members of this body to-day, they would have said to the President of the United States, "Take this treaty back. It is only a part of the obligation you ask us to assume, and we will not bind ourselves by it. We will not even consider it until we know all about it. Bring in everything that relates to it."

But, Mr. President, we have been trained for two years during the war, we have been taught, as a part of the Congress, to jump through the hoop and to perform other circus acrobatics.

Mr. REED. Lie down and roll over. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; to lie down and roll over whenever the President said so, until the Senate of the United States, as a part of the Congress, has become an abject and subservient body, fallen from its high estate, one of the pillars of this Government, without which there is no possibility of maintaining democracy in this country.

So, Mr. President, we need a regeneration. It may be that it is to come from the people. It seems that this body and the other branch are moribund, are having sleeping sickness. They can not assert the rights that belong to them under the Constitution. That is the way it looks to me. Is it possible that it is going to take the shock of an uprising of the people, demanding that democracy shall be saved, to bring this body and the other branch of Congress to a realizing sense of their constitutional duties and responsibilities?

[At this point Mr. LODGE engaged in a brief conversation with Mr. LA FOLLETTE.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, we can not hear on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, in order to inform the Senator from Texas, who is more interested in this, I think, than in what preceded it, the discussion of the problem before the Senate, I will say that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was inquiring as to about how long it would take me to conclude and whether we could get a vote to-night; and I was informing him, I will say, in order that the Senator from Texas may have both sides, that I was about halfway through [laughter], unless I shall be tempted to digress again, and in that case I may not be a quarter of the way through. Now you have about as definite information as I can give you.

I here resume the discussion, Mr. President, from my notes at the point where I was tempted to turn aside.

The proposal that we shall ratify the German peace treaty without knowing what is in the other four, with which it is "intertwined," illustrates the manner in which our Government has been led deeper and deeper into the morass of European affairs, until it is now proposed that we not only guarantee the peace of Europe but that we shall be the guardian of those peoples and territories over which the European Governments do not care to accept the mandates. If they have any job over there that is particularly hard they turn it over to us.

ITALY'S SHARE OF THE SPOILS.

I pass now to Italy's share in the spoils of the war, in the possession of which we undertake to protect her by signing this league agreement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves the subject of the assumption of mandates, would he care to state his conclusions on our acceptance of the Armenian mandate, with the Ottoman Empire attached, with Germany's Berlin to Bagdad railroad scheme, and future entanglements that might arise from such an arrangement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just let me say to the Senator that I have planned another address to the Senate upon the subject of our playing footman to Great Britain, and I shall take that up in that connection. I would like to reserve that for that discussion. It is mighty interesting, and if the Senator should chance to be present at that time I venture to say he will follow it with interest.

The simplest way to arrive at the facts is to turn to the secret treaty of London, signed April 26, 1915, and published by the Lenin government after it came into power in Russia. The terms of this treaty are fairly well known, thanks to the publication of the secret treaties to which Russia was a party by the revolutionary Russian Government when it came into power.

You know we would have never known anything about these secret treaties if it had not been for that much-denounced Government in Russia. They got possession of the infamous documents and gave them to the world.

Under article 4 of the treaty of London it was agreed by Great Britain, France, and Russia, parties to the treaty, that Italy should receive that part of Austria known as the Trentino, the entire southern Tyrol, the city and suburbs of Trieste and various other parts of Austria, the Istrian Islands along her eastern coast, and the Province of Dalmatia and various islands adjacent thereto. Furthermore, it was agreed to by this precious quartet of nations that Italy, in consideration of the foregoing spoils, was not to object to or oppose a desire on the part of France, Great Britain, and Russia to redistribute among Montenegro, Serbia, and Greece the northern and southern districts of Albania.

Such a thing as an agreement to dismember a friendly, though weak, power would hardly shock the countries that later agreed with Japan to carve up and distribute the territory of their ally, China.

But there are other provisions of this treaty which, if we are to guarantee it, we should scan with care.

By article 9 of this treaty it is provided that France, Great Britain, and Russia recognize in Italy her "right to receive on the division of Turkey an equal share with them in the basin of the Mediterranean, and more specifically in that part of it contiguous to the Province of Adalia. * * * The zone subject to transfer to the sovereignty of Italy will be more specifically defined in due time, and in correspondence with the vital interests of France and Great Britain."

Article 13 of this precious document provides as follows:

In the event of expansion of French and English colonial domains in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognize in principle the Italian right to demand for herself certain compensations in the sense of expansions of her lands in Erithria, Somaliland, in Libya, and colonial districts lying on the boundary, with the colonies of France and England.

By article 17 it is provided:

This treaty must be kept secret.

That seemed to be an important provision.

Now, the significance of all this is that no one knows up to date, or at least the Senate of the United States does not know it, what Italy's share is to be on the division of Turkey, nor what her share is to be on the division of the German colonies, nor, indeed, what her share is to be in the much more specific matter of division of territory taken from Austria.

It seems that the city of Fiume was not mentioned specifically as part of Italy's share of the spoils, but she is in possession of it, and Mr. Wilson and all the league of nations do not seem to be able to dispossess her. When we undertake, as we do, by becoming a member of this league to guarantee the territorial integrity of Italy, do we guarantee her the possession of Fiume, or do we guarantee its possession to Czechoslovakia, whose claims the President seems to support?

Are you going to arrive at a settlement of the division of the world by becoming a party to that dispute? Do you think you are doing the best you can to take one side or the other of that proposition? You have to take one side or the other of it. Or will you better represent the people of your State by washing your hands of the entire affair and saying we have done our part in this business and we will get back on to our own soil, we will take care of the problems that are pressing upon us from the States. With strikes everywhere, the very earth under our feet quaking with unrest, we, with eyes uplifted and following voices in the air, troop after Woodrow Wilson to look after the affairs of the world.

What is the territory in Africa and in the Mediterranean which we undertake to defend for Italy? As far as we know, it has not yet been determined. Italy, France, and Great Britain either have not settled it among themselves or if they have we have not been officially advised of the settlement. We have to answer these questions some time; we might as well ask them now. Suppose they quarrel about it. We will have to take a hand in that quarrel.

Yet, sir, it is proposed that we shall defend Italy in the possession of whatever lands may be allotted to her and uphold her rule over whatever people are made subject to her will.

Mr. President, I can not understand why the Senate will even consider so mad a proposition as this. We do not know what Italy is to receive, but we propose to guarantee it to her anyway. That is what this means. Vote it if you dare. We do not know but what the award made to her by the Paris conference—or which, in the case of Fiume, she may seize and hold in spite of that conference, finally compelling acquiescence—will violate every principle of justice and self-determination; but we sign the bond. That is what it means to go into this business. It is proposed that we shall bind this Government.

We are to bind the people of this country to defend Italy's possessions as determined by the peace conference, right or wrong, to uphold her rule, and the decision and decree of the peace conference, however shocking it may be to us as individuals.

It is a strange thing, Mr. President, that we have been debating for months whether we would pledge the United States to uphold and defend the revolutionary, territorial, and political changes made by the Paris conference; but we have not inquired, and we do not to-day know, as we are proceeding to vote upon this treaty, what is involved in those territorial and political changes brought about in Paris.

I do not know how any member of the Committee on Foreign Relations can defend the course that has been pursued. I think all of us have an obligation. I think Members of the Senate ought to have risen in their places here and protested against the consideration of this treaty at all until all the treaties and all the documents and all the papers were before us. Why not? I shall be glad to yield to another Senator here who will answer.

I know that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has asked for these documents; I know that the Senate has passed resolutions requesting that the various documents should be sent to us; but when they were not sent there was another answer to make the imperious power at the other end of the Avenue. What was it? "Very well, if you decline to put us in possession of all of the facts which will enable us to know what obligation we are incurring as a Government and imposing upon our people, by giving us all the treaties that are a part of and intertwine with this compact of the league of nations, then we refuse to move one inch in the consideration of it, and we refuse to take it up for consideration at all."

Then it would have been the old Senate, it would have been a Senate that stood for its rights under the Constitution, that was willing to go back to the people of the country on the issue of whether it was abiding by the Constitution or whether the President was violating the Constitution.

Three or four old men over there within the last few months have assumed to rewrite the map of the world and to change the Governments under which hundreds of millions of people are living, and we are asked to accept their work on faith and to declare that it is good in advance, without knowing anything about it, and to pledge the money and the lives of our citizens to uphold and defend it.

I say, sir, that what we know of the work of the Paris conference as revealed in the German treaty and as revealed in what we suppose in the Austrian treaty gives us no reason to believe that selfish ambitions, greed, and the desire of revenge will not be manifest in the settlements made by that conference, of which as yet we know practically nothing.

I think it is safe to say that the Senate is not going to ratify the German treaty with the Shantung provision. Even the mildest of the mild reservationists can not stand for that. Yet how do we know how many Shantungs we will find in the Austrian treaty and in the Bulgarian treaty and in the Turkish treaty when we see them?

Am I consuming the time of the Senate here needlessly? Am I asking questions that have no significance and no meaning? If so, I should like to be told of it. I would not prolong this session by this address a minute. But if we now concur in the German treaty and subscribe to this covenant it will be too late when we see the other treaties to strike out or refuse to be bound by such shameful provisions as the Shantung provision of this treaty. When we have undertaken by becoming party to this covenant to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league in all that has been allotted to them by the Paris conference, we have ratified all the treaties in substance and effect. The rest is mere detail, after this first job is over.

There is another thought in this connection worthy of consideration. Italy, in common with the other allies, as a result of their victory in this war has become imperialistic to an extent hardly conceived of before the war.

I wonder how many Senators on this floor have been studying the emanations from the Italian writers since the war spirit fired that emotional nationality? The powerful Nationalist Party in Italy is preaching the doctrine, which is received by the Italians with enthusiasm, that Italy must once more play the part of ancient Rome. Prof. Corradini, a member of this party and one of the most influential men in Italy, recently expressed it thus—and I want to say that this is not an isolated case. I could fill a dozen pages with quotations from the writings of eminent writers of Italy who are now seeking to stir this spirit, to fire with enthusiasm the people of Italy into a movement that is to make them sweep on and on in conquest until they are the foremost power of the world. Here is what Prof. Corradini says:

> Italy must become once more the first nation of the world. * * * All our efforts will tend toward making the Italian a warlike race. We will give it a new will; we will instill into it the appetite for power, the need of mighty hopes. We will create a religion—the religion of the fatherland victorious over the other nations. (From article in the Forum, September, 1915, by T. L. Stoddard.)

The Italian literature of to-day, its press, and even its schools and colleges are teaching this doctrine of Italian domination. The manner in which a picturesque Italian character has taken possession with a volunteer army of the city of Fiume and is holding it from Jugoslavia, in spite of the league of nations and the Paris conference and their combined authority, is merely a concrete manifestation of the spirit in which Italy is going forward to collect the balance of her claims in the spoils of this war. Who shall say what bloody conflicts will arise in the course of that adjustment and to what distant lands our soldiers must be sent to sacrifice their lives in the settlement of selfish quarrels wherein we have no interest and feel no sympathy with either side?

It is becoming more obvious every day that the so-called economic and moral power of this league will amount to little or nothing. The Allies know this. They know that this so-called league is merely an alliance in which the United States is to become a party and bind itself to defend the possessions and dominions which the imperialistic Governments of the league claim for themselves as a result of the war.

ROUMANIA'S SHARE OF THE SPOILS.

The part played by Roumania both before and after she entered the war is well known. Assuming first a neutral position when the war broke out, she inclined from one side to the other of the conflict as the fortunes of war ebbed and flowed, but finally entered the war on the promise of the Allies that she should receive in case of success a slice of Austrian territory about equal to her present area.

Before entering the war Roumania's population was estimated at 7,500,000, and her area placed at about 53,000 square miles. The area given her on recent maps, based on the theory that the secret treaty with her will be carried out, gives her an area substantially the same as that of Italy, or 110,000 square miles, and an estimated population of 16,000,000.

Roumania did not wait for the Paris conference to award her what she thought was coming to her, but on January 11, 1919, by royal decree proceeded to annex Transylvania, which had declared its independence of Hungary.

As showing the uncertain condition in which the whole matter is left in regard to the supposed Austrian treaty as published, though the Senate, of course, has no certain information respecting its terms—I mean no official information—under the provisions relating to Roumania it is provided that the frontiers of Roumania will—

> Ultimately be fixed by the principal allied and associated powers.

Now, mark you, the boundaries are not even fixed yet. They are to be fixed.

It further provides, in article 61:

> Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present treaty—

What Roumania will receive is ultimately to be determined by the allied and associated powers. So run the provisions of the Austrian treaty. Here, again, we are virtually asked to sign the name of the United States at the bottom of a blank sheet of paper and give the peace conference at Paris authority to fill in above it whatever terms it chooses to write there.

But that is not all. Suppose Roumania does not agree to accept what the allied and associated powers offer her in full payment of her share of the spoils of war. Who is going to force Roumania to accept it? Obviously not Italy, France, or Great Britain. They have declined to do exactly that thing. Months ago Roumania claimed more of the territory of the new Hungary than the members of the Paris conference were willing to award her and invaded and overran Hungary; and after months of military occupation late dispatches indicate her withdrawal from Budapest alone; but there is no evidence that she will give up the large areas south of Budapest which she now occupies, something like 100,000 square miles of territory, against the decree of the Paris conference.

Where is the vaunted economic pressure of the league by which its decrees are to be enforced without resort to arms? How can it ever be applied to such a situation as exists in Hungary? The invading army is already in possession of large sections of the country and its wealth and resources, and would be the last to feel the pinch of any economic pressure. Either the Roumanian armies will stay where they are as long as Roumania pleases, and if they withdraw will retire to boundaries of her own fixing, or else a superior armed force must be sent against them.

It has been demonstrated that neither the French, Italian, or English will undertake the task. Obviously the Italians will not, for they are in the same position in Fiume that the Roumanians are in Hungary.

Both are defying the decrees of the Paris conference and the authority of the league. The English and French will not, first, because they are disinclined to turn their arms against one so recently an ally, and who is a neighbor, and secondly, their claims to new territory are unsettled and in controversy, and they have no intention of making enemies of neighboring members of the league. So it seems that if the United States is going to become a member of this league and uphold its decrees, it already has two wars on its hands; one to drive the Italians out of Fiume, and the other to drive the Roumanians out of Hungary.

FRANCE'S SHARE OF THE SPOILS.

Everyone is familiar, of course, with the territorial acquisitions of France on the Continent, including Alsace-Lorraine, and the right to exploit the Saar Basin for a period of 15 years under conditions which will ultimately cause its annexation to France, if France desires it. Alsace-Lorraine has an area of about 5,600 square miles, and of the 1,900,000 of population it had in 1910, something over 1,600,000 was a German-speaking population. What share France has in the vast colonial empire obtained from Germany, like most of the other territorial transfers provided for, is uncertain.

BULGARIA.

Bulgaria, with an area of about 47,000 square miles, and a population of about 5,500,000, we know is to lose some of her territory to Greece, and some of it to Serbia, but the amounts going to each have not been settled. She also has to pay an indemnity amounting to $450,000,000, nearly equal to one-half the total indemnity France paid to Germany in 1871.

TURKEY.

Turkey comprises something more than 613,000 square miles, and a population of over 20,000,000. It is one of the most valuable prizes of the war, and consequently one over which the Allies are already most vigorously contending. Greece has already come forward with claims to an immensely rich and prosperous area, including the seaport of Smyrna, one of the great harbors of the world. Italy is out with claims to another large portion of Turkey, including Adalia, on the Mediterranean. Italy will be a factor with which France and Great Britain must reckon, for her population is rapidly increasing and she is most anxious that the surplus should be located near the home country, and live under the Italian flag. France claims an area somewhat larger than California, while Britain, as usual, by claiming the Mesopotamia region, asserts her right to the most valuable territory of all.

I have here sketched as briefly as possible the conflicting territorial claims of the Allies, mostly on the Continent of Europe, although I have included to some extent Asiatic Turkey. I have not dwelt upon the justice or injustice of any of these claims. If an agreement has been made as to the distribution of this territory, we do not know what it is; whether it has been made or not we do not know whether it is or will be based upon principles which we approve. Yet we are asked to accept it on faith and to assume the obligation to uphold and defend it.

I have not touched upon the economic penalties, the most severe in the history of the world, which this treaty imposes upon the defeated powers. Never since the victorious armies led away their captives in chains to actual slavery has so harsh a peace as this been imposed by the victor on the vanquished at the close of any war. These exactions, of course, our membership in the league will require us to support and defend. Already it is apparent that Italy and Roumania can successfully defy the peace conference and the league of nations, and without a large military force to support the decrees of the league those decrees will be utterly futile. And if Roumania and Italy may defy the league, why may not Greece, why may not Serbia, why may not, in fact, any other country dissatisfied with the spoils which may have been allotted to it?

This is but a brief and imperfect survey of the shocking conditions which await us upon our entrance into this league.

No rational man can doubt but the United States will be the Nation relied upon to furnish the men and the money to enforce the decrees and mandates of the league throughout central Europe and parts of Asia and Africa.

Who can doubt that the self-interest of Italy, Roumania, Greece, and Serbia, when they find their ambitions thwarted by the more powerful members of the league, particularly by the United States, will come together in a union of self-interest, and what we start to do in the first instance with a few thousand men we shall soon find requires a vast army? All this and vastly more is involved in the obligations we will assume under article 10 of this treaty.

Mr. President, the little group of men who sat in secret conclave for months at Versailles were not peacemakers. They were war makers. They cut and slashed the map of the Old World in violation of the terms of the armistice. They patched up a new map of the Old World in consummation of the terms of the secret treaties the existence of which they had denied because they feared to expose the sordid aims and purposes for which men were sent to death by the tens of thousands daily. They betrayed China. They locked the chains on the subject peoples of Ireland, Egypt, and India. They partitioned territory and traded off peoples in mockery of that sanctified formula of 14 points, and made it our Nation's shame. Then, fearing the wrath of outraged peoples, knowing that their new map would be torn to rags and tatters by the conflicting warring elements which they had bound together in wanton disregard of racial animosities, they made a league of nations to stand guard over the swag!

The Old World armies were exhausted. Their treasuries were empty. It was imperative that they should be able to draw upon the lusty man power and the rich material resources of the United States to build a military cordon around the new boundaries of the new States of the Old World.

Senators, if we go into this thing, it means a great standing Army; it means conscription to fight in foreign wars, a blighting curse upon the family life of every American home, every hour. It means higher taxes, higher prices, harder times for the poor. It means greater discontent; a deeper, more menacing unrest.

Mr. President, whatever course other Senators take, I shall never vote to bind my country to the monstrous undertaking which this covenant would impose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to present the following substitute reservations to take the place of those proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I ask to have them printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). It will be so ordered.

The reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. HITCHCOCK are as follows:

Proposed substitute reservations, to take the place of reservations proposed by Senator LODGE:

"That any member nation proposing to withdraw from the league on two years' notice is the sole judge as to whether its obligations referred to in article 1 of the league of nations have been performed as required in said article.

"That no member nation is required to submit to the league, its council, or its assembly for decision, report, or recommendation any matter which it considers to be in international law a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matters relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

"That the national policy of the United States known as the Monroe doctrine, as announced and interpreted by the United States, is not in any way impaired or affected by the covenant of the league of nations and is not subject to any decision, report, or inquiry by the council or assembly.

"That the advice mentioned in article 10 of the covenant of the league which the council may give to the member nations as to the employment of their naval and military forces is merely advice which each member nation is free to accept or reject, according to the conscience and judgment of its then existing government, and in the United States this advice can only be accepted by action of the Congress at the time in being, Congress alone under the Constitution of the United States having the power to declare war.

"That in case of a dispute between members of the league if one of them have self-governing colonies, dominions, or parts which have representation in the assembly, each and all are to be considered parties to the dispute, and the same shall be the rule if one of the parties to the dispute is a self-governing colony, dominion, or part, in which case all other self-governing colonies, dominions, or parts, as well as the nation as a whole, shall be considered parties to the dispute and each and all shall be disqualified from having their votes counted in case of any inquiry on said dispute made by the assembly."

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the following amendment to the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed reservation of the committee No. 3 the following:

Provided, however, That the United States assumes for the period of five years with the other members of the league the obligation of said article 10 as to the Republic of France in maintaining her sovereignty over Alsace-Lorraine.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the rest of the day with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I again desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and his pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I withdraw my vote, as I have a pair with that Senator. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX. I repeat the announcement of my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]; the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of illness in his family. If he were present he would vote "yea." He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 46, not voting 18, as follows:

YEAS—31.

So Mr. MCKELLAR'S amendment to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE on behalf of the committee, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon reservation No. 3, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] for the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. To that reservation I offer the following substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations known as reservation No. 3 insert the following:

That the advice mentioned in article 10 of the covenant of the league which the council may give to the member nations as to the employment of their naval and military forces is merely advice which each member nation is free to accept or reject, according to the conscience and judgment of its then existing government, and in the United States this advice can only be accepted by action of the Congress at the time in being, Congress alone under the Constitution of the United States having the power to declare war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair as on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the rest of the day with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. On account of his absence, he being absent by reason of illness, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NELSON'S name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY'S name was called). I again announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I again announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of illness. If he were present he would vote "yea." He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. REED. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is necessarily absent because of illness. On this vote he is paired. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] did not vote. I am paired with that Senator. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ashurst	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Overman	Thomas
Dial	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Trammell
Fletcher	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Underwood
Gay	Kendrick	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Kirby	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams
Harrison	Myers	Smith, Md.	Wolcott

NAYS—44.

Ball	Fernald	Lenroot	Poindexter
Borah	France	Lodge	Reed
Calder	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sherman
Capper	Gore	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Colt	Gronna	McNary	Smoot
Cummins	Hale	Moses	Spencer
Curtis	Harding	New	Sterling
Dillingham	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Sutherland

NOT VOTING—19.

Bankhead	Kellogg	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	King	Pomerene	Stanley
Chamberlain	Knox	Robinson	Swanson
Culberson	McCormick	Shields	Wadsworth
Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Simmons

So Mr. HITCHCOCK'S substitute for reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] known as reservation No. 3.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer a substitute, and on it ask the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of reservation numbered 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, the Senator from Oklahoma offers the following substitute:

The United States in assuming the obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or existing political independence of any other country, or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, does so with the understanding that the advice or recommendation of the council or assembly under articles 10 and 15 is purely advisory and absolutely subject to such judgment and action as the Congress of the United States may find justified by the facts in any case submitted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this is exactly the same as the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], upon which the Senate has just voted.

Mr. SMOOT and others. Oh, let us vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote regarding my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last vote with respect to my pair, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as that I previously made with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NELSON's name was called). I again announce the pair of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY's name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I make the same announcement as before in regard to my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS]. If present and not paired he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] did not vote. I therefore withdraw my vote. I am paired with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Trammell
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Underwood
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Kendrick	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.

So Mr. OWEN's substitute for reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, while Senators who are supporting the pending reservation seem to be voting more because of pledges than from preference, I desire to offer what I send to the desk to be added to the pending reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and to say that its author is the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed to the reservation by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. As an addition to reservation No. 3 it is proposed to add:

But, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before voting on the amendment, I should like to say that I think I was present at the time when the policy that it expresses was proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in a speech which he delivered in the Senate. It is a declaration of policy which corresponds to the action of the United States in intervening finally in the European war because of the belief on the part of this country that European affairs had reached a point that menaced the safety of the United States and were threatening civilization itself. However, my understanding of the proposition as made by the Senator from Pennsylvania was not that he proposed it as a part of the league of nations; not that he proposed that it should be an expression of our policy as a member of the league of nations or as an indication of any expectation or interpretation which foreign countries might have as to what we should do as a member of a great world Government; but, on the contrary, my understanding of the proposition—and I wish to say that I concur in the wisdom of the policy expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania—was that it was proposed as a substitute for the entire scheme of a combination of nations under a constitution of world Government. As such substitute, I am willing to support it and to declare it the policy of the United States; but as an amendment or integral part of the covenant of the league of nations, I certainly shall vote against it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has substantially stated what my position was at the time the resolution to which he refers was introduced, but he has not fully done so.

I think Senators will recall, when I bring it to their attention, that that was one section of a resolution that was offered expressing the sentiment of the Senate that the thing for our peace commissioners in Paris to do was to make peace; that the whole subject of a league of nations should be deferred to a future time; that all of the nations of the world should be invited to convene and discuss the question of a league of nations; and that in the meanwhile, in order to give assurance to the world that the United States could be relied upon to come to the defense of civilization when it was necessary, I offered that suggestion as a policy, a policy somewhat akin to the Monroe doctrine, a policy announced ex parte by the United States which did not obligate us to anybody, but which we were to exercise, as the circumstances might arise, in accordance with our own conscience and our own judgment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on line 14 I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which I think he will probably accept. After the word "freedom" I desire to amend his amendment so that it will read "the freedom of the seas and the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On line 14, after the word "freedom," it is proposed to insert the words "of the seas and the freedom," so that it will read:

But, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom of the seas and the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall be very glad to accept the amendment if I thereby can secure the support for the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is to prevail, I wish to make it as acceptable—to make it as little objectionable—as possible; to contribute as much to a sound policy, to the peace and security of the world, as possible. I am not willing to vote for it in any event, because I am not willing to make any universal pledge of this character. We can meet these obligations and these contingencies as they arise. I am not willing to mortgage our future; I am not willing to mortgage our wealth; I am not willing to mortgage our boys to be sacrificed in every war that shall ever occur in every age. For that reason I shall vote against the entire commitment. I am opposed to universal liens of this character that are to last forever. But if we are to make a pledge of this kind, let us pledge ourselves to secure the freedom of the seas, which was the chief, if not the only, interest the United States had in entering this war.

Mr. President, every other nation secures benefits from the pending treaty. They do not assume burdens alone; they are to realize incalculable benefits. The United States assumes burdens alone, and it is to realize no benefits or compensation in return.

Under this treaty Great Britain receives 803,000 square miles of territory and dominion over 33,000,000 people. In addition to that, she has interpreted the freedom of the seas to mean British mastery of the seas. France obtains, as she ought to obtain, the control and the ownership of Alsace-Lorraine. In addition to that, she obtains the Saar Valley. Many believe that the Saar Valley should have gone to Belgium rather than to France. I pronounce no judgment upon that issue, but I believe, in addition to that, even France is to secure colonies in Africa. Italy secures Italia Irridenta, a part of the Tyrol, and, I believe, concessions in Asia Minor. Greece, Roumania, and Serbia obtain great concessions of territory. Poland and Czechoslovakia are to obtain independence, sovereignty, and existence itself. Japan is to secure Shantung, in contravention of justice, good faith, sound policy, and strategy, so far as the United States are concerned. We have raised an Alsace-Lorraine question in the East which will rankle and rankle and rankle for generations, until it is righted by the sword, or else we have placed China under the yoke of Japan and have made of the yellow peril a yellow terror before which the white race may well tremble for its destiny.

And what does the United States obtain? The right to defend the boundaries of every nation upon this globe—in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, and in the islands of the sea. What do we obtain? Our only right is to tax our people, to spend our money, to draft our boys, to sacrifice their lives in defense of the boundaries of every nation upon the globe.

America hews wood; America draws water; America staggers, like Atlas, beneath the weight of the world.

Senators who stand for article 10 without change or reservation overlook this truth. If five years hence the United States desire to draft and send their boys to defend the territorial integrity of Jugoslavia, they can do so then, covenant or no covenant; if 10 years hence the United States desire to spend their money and shed their blood in defense of the political independence of Czechoslavia, they can do so then, covenant or no covenant; if 20 years hence the United States desire to sacrifice both life and treasure in defense of the southern boundary of Egypt or the northern boundary of India, they can ordain that sacrifice then as well as now, but there are those of us who are unwilling to sign and to seal that bond now, who are unwilling to execute a perpetual mortgage upon the treasure or a universal lien upon the lives of our people.

We are unwilling to rivet the chains upon the limbs of posterity. The evil of that day will be sufficient. I am one of those who believe that article 10 as it is written imposes both a legal and a moral obligation upon the United States. The only way to escape that obligation would be to treat this covenant as a scrap of paper. There is indeed no way to enforce an obligation against a sovereign nation except by the bloody mandamus of war.

We obtain no benefits in compensation for these tremendous, these tragic promises except that in case Carranza should recapture Texas, then Liberia, Haiti, and Siam will rush to the rescue. [Laughter.] I am not willing to assume such obligations proposed by this amendment or any other. I am not willing for the United States to become the Don Quixote of the twentieth century.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. [Putting the question.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think there is some misunderstanding. I understand the Senator from Nebraska desires the yeas and nays on his amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which I have proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma or upon his own amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Upon my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was upon the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma that the Senator asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood that was defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is rejected. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only wish to observe, in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska, that it is not the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania; it is a part of a resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania on which he could not get a vote in the Foreign Relations Committee when the Senator from Nebraska was chairman of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made upon the preceding roll call, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I renew the announcement made on previous roll calls, and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY's name was called). Making the same announcement as to the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and his pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I will state that if present he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I again make the same announcement as on past roll calls with reference to my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

EMBARGO ON DYES AND COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

As in legislative session,

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I reported favorably yesterday, from the Committee on Finance, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the control of imports of dyes and coal-tar products. It is a joint resolution of great importance. It will not lead to much discussion, I think, and I ask unanimous consent to have it considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President. I know that the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] expressed a desire on yesterday to be here when the joint resolution is taken up.

Mr. PENROSE. If that is the only objection the Senator from Georgia entertains, I will say that I saw the ranking minority member of the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from North Carolina, and I think he approves of the joint resolution with an amendment, which I shall offer in his absence and which he would have offered had he been present. He told me that he could not remain in the Chamber this evening.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will let it go over until Saturday, I think I will have definite information upon the subject by that time. To-night I really do not feel that I ought to agree to unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only want to tell the Senator that he is taking some responsibility in having it go over. I do not know what will be the result, but the talk in the House of Representatives is that that body will, under some form, adjourn or take a recess on Saturday, and as the joint resolution will be amended here, the amendment will have to be concurred in by the House. If the House does not remain in session and the joint resolution has to wait until Saturday, it is hardly worth while for me to detain the Senate by considering it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not investigated the matter. I am not now on the Finance Committee. I have just heard from two of my associates nearby that their advices are that the objections that I thought might be made will not be made, and unless some member of the Finance Committee or some other Senator presses the objection, I do not feel called upon to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, pending the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania I ask him if he will have read the amendment that he proposes to offer?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. I will ask the Secretary first to read the part of the joint resolution which the Finance Committee has agreed to, having struck out the balance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a very short extension, I understand.

Mr. PENROSE. To the 15th of January, 1920.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the prior termination of the war the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act, approved October 6, 1917, and of any proclamation of the President issued in pursuance thereof which prohibit or control the importation into the United States of dyes or other products derived directly or indirectly from coal tar are continued until January 15, 1920.

Mr. PENROSE. If any Senator desires the remainder of the joint resolution read, it can be read for information, but it has been stricken out, and an amendment has been submitted. I think I am entirely justified in saying that the ranking minority member of the Finance Committee would have offered it himself had he been here. I endeavored to see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a little earlier in the afternoon with a desire of asking him to offer it, if it met with his approval.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator have the amendment that he intends to offer read now?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

During the period between the passage of this joint resolution and January 15, 1920, the War Trade Board section of the Department of State shall not issue to any person, corporation, partnership, or association any license or permit to import into the United States any dye or coal-tar product which is produced in the United States in quantities sufficient to meet the requirements of the consuming trades, nor for any substitute therefor, and during such period no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall import into the United States any dye or coal-tar product except by virtue of a license or permit from the War Trade Board section of the Department of State.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to what I think is a typographical error in the amendment. I think the word "due" should be "dye."

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I presume so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DIAL. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I object to its consideration, and I want to explain why.

Mr. PENROSE. May I be permitted to say a few words before he states his objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this has been a very difficult subject before the Finance Committee on account of the parliamentary situation. I will state candidly that I am not persuaded as to what ought to be done in connection with the proper protection of the dyestuff industry. But it was impossible to go into an extended hearing, as will be required, while this peace treaty is under consideration. It was contended by the producers of dyestuffs that unless they were absolutely protected during the era of peace, before legislation could be passed, it being assumed that final disposition would be made of the treaty at an early day, peace will come, and Germany is so ready to swamp the American market with the dye products that the American industries would be ruined forever. This is simply an attempt, whether rightly or wrongly I do not contend, to give the producers of dyestuffs and the textile, silk, and other manufacturers, as well as consumers, an interregnum, so as to permit the Finance Committee to give fair and just consideration to this very important matter. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania to make his explanation. I understood the Senator to say that there were quite extensive hearings before the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. No; but there will have to be hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The committee had no hearings at all.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not say they had. I said we will be compelled to have hearings. I could not get a quorum of the committee, and I enlisted the interests of such members as I could to attend a conference with every interest concerned to see how we could bridge over the period until Congress could act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. I yielded to the Senator for one explanation.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee, as a committee, had a meeting upon this question, and it had but one meeting. There were no hearings of any description before it, of course, as the Senator says. During that meeting there were two propositions presented, in the form of a bill. The first was to stop all importations of dyestuffs and of certain coal-tar preparations out of fear that Germany might dump them on us in a little while.

The second proposition was to shut off the power of the President and of this War Trade Board to issue any licenses during that time. Opposition was made by several of us—I amongst others—on the ground that the United States Government ought to keep a whip hand over the situation, and that if we just simply forbade the importation of these products, then the men who managed the production of them, in partnership with the men who were the immediate consumers but not the ultimate consumers, could arrive at an arrangement whereby the ultimate consumer could be robbed and gross profiteering could take place. There was an answer made to that to the effect that the mill owners did not object to what the producers of these products wanted to do. The answer was made in turn to that that of course if they entered into an agreement with one another, they could profiteer together at the expense of the general public, and that therefore the second clause of the original bill, which forbade the issuance of licenses to anybody to import under any circumstances, should be stricken out of the bill.

Even a threat to grant a license to import could prevent profiteering. Even the knowledge of the power on the part of governmental agencies to issue such licenses would or could operate as a deterrent.

The Finance Committee adopted that joint resolution but struck the last provision out, and sent the joint resolution here with a favorable report for the first proposition, down to the middle of line 9, on the first page. So what the Finance Committee did was to agree that we should forbid importation of these dyestuffs, but should leave the governmental board so that it could, if these people attempted to profit unduly by the situation, at least threaten them with the issuance of licenses to import or issue the licenses.

That was the action of the Finance Committee, and I am not prepared to agree, by unanimous consent, that we shall consider something as done by the Finance Committee that never was done by it, or that we shall agree to take up for immediate consideration something that did not receive the committee's approval. That is the explanation of my objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply want to explain the situation to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon, if that is the object of his interruption; the situation has been explained fully to the Senator from Mississippi. People are afraid that there might come in shiploads of stuff from Germany, especially dyestuffs and certain coal-tar preparations which are used in drugs and other things.

I agree heartily that such a menace must be met, and I voted in the committee to stop the importation. But when they wanted to pass a second proposition, which was to stop all licenses in the meantime, and thereby leave these people free to profiteer who naturally will be profiteering, because it is to their interest to profiteer, then upon my own motion in the committee the latter part of the bill was stricken out.

Now, Mr. President, one more word. I think this is a matter that ought to be sent back to the committee for the purpose of seeing whether the committee is willing to agree to this modified amendment of the second clause which by the committee itself was stricken out. If the committee wants to modify it, a meeting can be held very quickly. In the meanwhile, however, I object to its immediate consideration, because I am not prepared to vote for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I yield to the Senator from New Jersey, not the floor, but for an interruption.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the Senator. The joint resolution is an emergency measure, and very necessary at the present time. There has been established during the war an industry producing nearly $80,000,000 worth of dyes a year. This industry will be captured by Germany unless some relief legislation of this character is immediately passed. It gives the power to the War Trade Board, in the Department of State, to issue licenses for dyes that are unobtainable and not manufactured in this country, and to prevent the issuance of licenses for dyes that are obtainable, in order that the industry may be maintained in this country. Unless some legislation of this character is passed it means that within the next few weeks, or possibly within a month, Germany will ship enough dyes into this country to crush this industry, which we have boasted that we were going to capture.

On this floor the Senator from Mississippi and many other Senators have said that we were going to crush Germany's industrial influence in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I never said so; certainly not in those general terms.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The time has now come to test the sincerity of those statements. If you are going to do it, it is necessary that the joint resolution shall be passed now. It does not give an undue advantage to any manufacturer in this country, and the ranking member of the minority in the Finance Committee has agreed to this amendment as it is drawn, knowing that it is necessary at this time to protect the industry in this manner.

This simply places in the hands of the Department of State the power to restrict the importation of certain dyes that are obtainable in this country until January 15, 1920, as an ad interim safeguard. That is all it is. In the meantime the Finance Committee can consider what legislation is necessary, protective or otherwise, in order to protect this industry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I recognize this as an emergency measure. I have already implied that by my observations upon the floor. I so expressed myself in the committee. Notwithstanding a long record somewhat at variance with the proposition presented, I agreed that under the particular circumstances as affecting this particular industry at this particular time I would vote to shut off the importation.

Now, the Senator tells me that our American industry will be totally ruined by German dumping. If the proposition is passed just as the Finance Committee adopted it, without this second proposition, then importations from Germany are cut off and Germany can not dump anything upon us in order to ruin our industries if the importation is cut off until January 15, as I believe the date is. Nobody can "dump" on you goods which he can not import. I agree to forbid importation for the limited time provided in the bill and with the existing license safeguards to check profiteering.

There came along after that this question; a duty to the American people was involved. The ultimate consumers, who buy the products, in the shape of clothes and medicine, into which these products enter, were concerned. The committee took the view, and the committee acted unanimously, so much so that the chairman never even put the motion to the committee, but announced that the committee had agreed that the second clause of the original bill would be stricken out and the second clause was stricken out. The committee agreed to a report adopting just the first clause, and that first clause reads as follows——

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will in a moment. That first clause reads as follows:

That notwithstanding the prior termination of the present war, the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act, approved October 6, 1917, and of any proclamation of the President issued in pursuance thereof which prohibit or control the importation into the United States of dyes or other products derived directly or indirectly from coal tar are continued until January 15, 1920.

That was what the Finance Committee agreed to. They agreed to strike out the balance, which is now represented in a modified form.

How can the Senator from New Jersey say that if the joint resolution is passed in that shape there should be any danger of German dumping? How can a thing be "dumped" which can not be landed? There is a plain proposition to stop importation in the bill as amended and reported by the Finance Committee.

But it had originally a provision in it, that during that period "neither the President nor the War Trade Board section of the Department of State nor any other agency of the Government should issue any licenses." I made the point, and it was not made by me alone, but by three or four other Senators—one of them, as I remember now, a Republican—that that would leave the Government helpless against profiteering——

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I will withdraw the amendment and with the help of the Senator from Mississippi endeavor to pass the joint resolution as reported from the committee and as amended by him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall be very glad, indeed, to do that.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is not under consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that we are trying to get rid of these "conscientious objectors."

Mr. DIAL. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am afraid the Senator from South Carolina did not understand it.

Mr. DIAL. I object, anyway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The joint resolution goes to the calendar.

RECESS UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In accordance with the understanding hereofore entered into, I move that the Senate now take a recess until Saturday morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in open executive session, took a recess until Saturday, November 15, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, November 13, 1919.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the cordial and amicable relations existing between Great Britain and our Government; hence our people with the President and the dignitaries of State and Nation extend a warm greeting to our distinguished guest the Prince of Wales, who represents his illustrious father.

Long may the friendly relations exist between the two great nations as an example to all the world.

Once more in the dispensation of Thy providence, our Father, are we called upon to mourn the loss of a well-beloved, wise, honest, conscientious statesman, who will be sorely missed by his colleagues in the Senate and a host of friends throughout his State and Nation. May the immortality of the soul comfort them, especially the bereaved children, through Him who died and rose from the dead and ascended into heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ZION NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on an act to (S. 425) establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to an act (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "under which name the aforesaid national park shall be maintained by allotment of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the national monuments, until such time as an independent appropriation is made therefor by Congress"; and the Senate agree to the same.

N. J. SINNOTT,
ADDISON T. SMITH,
JAS. H. MAYS,
Managers on the part of the House.

REED SMOOT,
ALBERT B. FALL,
HENRY L. MYERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The effect of the change agreed upon in conference is to strike from the House amendment the following language: "Provided alienated land shall be acquired in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior at a cost of not more than $5 per acre."

There are only 80 acres of alienated land in the proposed park.

It is not desired to purchase said land.

N. J. SINNOTT,
ADDISON T. SMITH,
JAS. H. MAYS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 36 ayes and 3 noes.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

METROPOLITAN POLICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9821 on the Speaker's table, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not necessary to have unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the gentleman has not yet asked for it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes," disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9821, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he would like to give the House the benefit of the position that he will take as one of the conferees on what is known as the Myers amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the conferees have had no opportunity to consider that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I presume the chairman is requesting the House to disagree to the Senate amendment as a pro forma request in order to get the matter to conference.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That would not indicate that the chairman or the conferees would be against any amendment; it is merely an effort to get the matter to conference.

Mr. MAPES. It does not indicate that the conferees are for or against the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the conferees would agree to strike out the Myers amendment, it being in accordance with the position of this House, taken both with respect to the police and with respect to the firemen as a part of the civil employees of the Government, whether or not before he would vote to strike out the Myers amendment he would give the House an opportunity to pass upon and discuss that question.

Mr. MAPES. I do not think I could bind the conferees of the House in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman could assure us of some chance to be heard on a serious proposition of that kind, I take it.

Mr. BABKA. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. If the regular order is going to be demanded and we can not get any light on the subject, I will object.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms directed to notify the absentees. The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-two Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, and I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9821.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration the bill H. R. 9821, the police salary bill, with Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9821) amending an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the purpose to send this bill to conference or move to concur? I think the House ought to know the purpose of taking it from the Speaker's table.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that my purpose in asking unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table is in order to make it possible, if the request be granted, to make a motion to disagree to the Senate amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will make his unanimous-consent request to take the bill from the Speaker's table and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate, then the Senate amendment and the consideration of the matter can be disposed of by unanimous consent and without a motion.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I made the request before the point of no quorum was made, and objection to it was made, and I had the assurance during the roll call that objection would be made to it if I renewed it. For that reason I have asked unanimous consent to take the bill up, and then, if that request is granted, I will have the right under the rule to make a motion to disagree to the Senate amendment and agree to the conference.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the effect of that would afford an opportunity to make a motion to concur or make a motion to instruct. I do not think at this time the House ought to take the time from the consideration of the railroad bill to vote on the matters involved in this bill. If the gentleman will submit a request to agree to the conference and insist——

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker, on the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will make the request——

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9821, to disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, the railroad bill, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon a letter from Mr. Hines, director of railways, was read to the House dealing with some very important points in the pending bill and criticizing some of them. I have here, addressed to the chairman, a letter from the railway executives through their counsel, replying to Mr. Hines's letter. It seems to me that if Mr. Hines is entitled to put his views before the House it would be proper and would be enlightening, and I am sure the House wants to be enlightened, to hear the letter from the railway executives, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that this letter may be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication referred to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman how many pages this letter has?

Mr. MERRITT. It is about the same length as Mr. Hines's letter.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask how many pages of typewritten matter? Will the Clerk so inform us?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there are nine typewritten pages.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a waste of time, and I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it if the gentleman thinks it will be helpful.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ASSOCIATION OF RAILWAY EXECUTIVES,
Washington, D. C., November 12, 1919.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ESCH: Mr. Sherley has kindly furnished me this afternoon with a copy of Mr. Hines's letter to you of the 11th instant. I have learned in the last few moments that this letter was read on the floor of the House this afternoon.

I am sorry I have not a more adequate opportunity to write a reply.

The first point made in this letter against section 205 of your bill H. R. 10453, as reported by your committee to the House, is that the reciprocity arrangement as to interest between the Government and the carriers is unjust to the Government.

The provision is that the Government will fund that part of the indebtedness to the carriers for additions and betterments, which in the bill it agrees to fund, at the same rate of interest which the President fixes as reasonable to pay to the carriers for the use, during Federal control, of the additions and betterments created by the indebtedness which is thus to be funded.

When it is remembered that these additions and betterments were made and put upon the carriers by the Government, some with and some without their concurrence, that this was done under war conditions, when capital could not be raised by the carriers under the ordinary condition of long-time loans, but was left as amounts immediately due, and that this was done in order that the Government might manage the roads in the interest of the public, which necessitated putting aside every private interest of the carriers, it must be admitted that it is not unreasonable to expect the Government now to fund and carry this capital indebtedness, created under the conditions above mentioned, for a period of 10 years as fixed by the bill.

When it is further remembered that the money raised by the indebtedness so created was, except as to certain capital obligations of a few carriers theretofore existing, expended to produce additions and betterments which the Government used for the public benefit during Federal control, and that the Federal control act, section 4, promised in advance that the President would pay for such use a reasonable rate of interest on the cost of such additions and betterments, which was to be fixed by him, it is manifestly fair that the Government should be expected to receive on any indebtedness due it for such additions and betterments the same rate of interest which the President fixes as reasonable for the Government to pay on the cost of such additions and betterments for their use during Federal control. The prevailing rate of interest during Federal control is now certainly as high as it will be in the next 10 years. If there is any change during this 10 years it will be downward. The carriers, if they pay on the funded debt the same rate that is reasonable during Federal control, will be paying a very liberal rate.

It is beside the question to consider the subject from the standpoint of the rate of interest which the Government is paying on the money it borrows. That, in my judgment, has nothing to do with this question. It is in the hands of the Government to say what rate will, under the circumstances, be reasonable. It can ignore the rate it is paying for money and fix the rate as high as 6 per cent, if the President deems that the reasonable rate. We only ask that the Government will take what it gives.

From the letter of the director general, it is apparent that our only chance of getting it is for Congress to settle the matter in this bill. Otherwise, notice is, by the letter referred to, served upon us that the Government will, through its executive branch, fix a different and a lower rate for it to pay than it asks Congress, the legislative branch, to fix for it to receive.

We respectfully insist that the principle of reciprocity is here a just principle; that the Government has the right, uncontrolled by the carriers, to fix a rate that is reasonable, and that such rate as is thus fixed as reasonable shall apply not only where the Government pays but where the Government receives. As it fixes the terms it should be willing to take the same rate that the Government representatives fix as reasonable for it to pay.

The second point made by the director general is that such amounts due by him to the carriers for compensation, etc., as the bill permits him to use as an offset to the carriers' indebtedness to him, should be deductible by him from the capital indebtedness the carriers owe him for additions and betterments; in other words, that the current income of the carriers should be diverted by the Government from current uses of the carriers and applied to pay their capital indebtedness. The distinction between capital indebtedness and current indebtedness is universal. Capital indebtedness must be provided for, for the most part, from capital sources, and can not in the nature of things be provided from current income. Except in the most prosperous businesses, with the most abundant income, this is never done, unless in a very limited degree. It should not now be attempted by the Government in the case of these carriers.

At best, the conditions under which they will resume the duty to furnish transportation adequate to the needs of the public will be difficult. Their difficulties should not be increased by requiring them to undertake the duty with empty treasuries. Their current assets should not be swept away to pay capital indebtedness for additions and betterments created for them under war conditions, and under conditions when it was impossible, because the Government was absorbing the entire financial capacity of the public for war purposes, for them to provide for the needed capital by the issue of long-term securities.

This is not a question in which the carriers alone are interested. The public is interested that the carriers should be in a position to furnish adequate transportation when their properties are returned to them. Why throw any obstacle in the way of their performing this public duty and service by sweeping away their current assets to pay an indebtedness incurred for capital purposes, and prevented at the time from being capitalized by the need that the financial resources of the Government should be diverted to the public defense in time of war? The effect of making the application of the set-offs to capital indebtedness instead of to current indebtedness would be to leave the carriers with a large amount of indebtedness immediately due of which they might be relieved by applying their current assets to current liabilities, and would likewise, because of this indebtedness thus left due on demand, greatly hamper, if not entirely prevent, them from going into the market to borrow money for their capital purposes which will be most pressing.

The third point made by the director general is that the Government should not be required to furnish the carriers with any working capital, except such assets as he may choose to leave in their hands with which to pay the Government's debts for current operations during Federal control. Such assets in no proper sense constitute working capital. They are sums owned by the Government and which the carrier is required by the standard contract to use to pay the Government's debts incurred for operation during Federal control.

It must be noted that the bill does not provide for any working capital, except in cases where the Government is indebted to the carrier, and in that case requires only that the amount of one month's operating expenses, if so much is due, shall not be deducted by the Government in ascertaining the amount which the Government will fund.

The fact that this does not apply except in cases where the money is due is used as an argument to show that no provision of a working capital is made for the roads which need it most. No such provision could be made for such roads where nothing is due to them, unless the Government is willing to pay money it does not owe; and this is not provided for by the bill. Whether the bill should go further and provide for the advancement of Government funds to the carriers to which it owes nothing is for Congress to determine. I do not understand, however, that the director general makes any such recommendation.

It will be observed, however, that, if the director general's argument is sound, that no working capital is needed because of the assets which will be left in the hands of the carriers to pay the debts of the Government, there is nothing in the bill to prevent the Government from leaving in the hands of the carriers, which the director general describes as most needy, any amount of assets it pleases, and the roads which, to use the expression of the director general, "need working capital most," would thus be provided for as well as the director general proposes to provide for the roads to which he owes money.

If the director general does owe a road money, is it not fair, as well as in the public interest, that there should be a working capital to help the carrier to whom this debt is due to restore its organization, regain its traffic, get back from other roads its scattered equipment and repair it, and thus put itself in a position to perform promptly and adequately its public duties? To deny this to the carriers to whom the money is due, because there are other carriers to whom it is not due, is to assert that the entire transportation of the country must be crippled because some of it can not be furnished money which is not due.

To say that all the purposes for which the carriers, on the return of their property to them, will so much need ready money are provided for by the assets that the Government will leave in their hands to pay the Government's debts for operation during Federal control is to assert that the carriers will be furnished with a working capital in receiving money which does not belong to them and which they must use to pay the Government's debts, and to refuse them for the purpose of conducting their operation money which does belong to them, and which therefore they can use without having to account for and repay it.

The difference is wide between the situation at the beginning of Federal control and the situation at the end.

At the beginning of Federal control the Government agreed to use any current assets of the carriers which came into its hands to pay the carriers' overlapping debts, but did not contract to pay the carriers' debts in excess of the amounts so received. At that time the carriers owed the Government nothing.

At the end of Federal control the carriers likewise promised, to the extent that any current assets of the Government are left in their hands by the Government, to pay the Government's overlapping debts due for current operations during Federal control.

But in the latter case the Government does owe the carriers money. Whatever it leaves in the carriers' hands to pay the Government's debts will not be in payment of the amount the Government owes the carriers but will be a fund provided by the Government to pay its own debts.

The question therefore presented is whether when the Government owes any carrier compensation for the use of its property during Federal control it shall insist upon using this compensation to pay the capital indebtedness of the carrier for additions and betterments or shall, to the extent of a reasonable working capital, put the carrier in the position to meet the difficult situation which will confront it in the resumption of its transportation duties.

It is manifestly in the public interest that the carriers shall be in position to meet their transportation duties as far as this can be done.

Which is best for the public, to have those of them do this to which an amount adequate for the purpose is due or to deprive all of them, although the amount may be due some for the use of their properties during Federal control, of a reasonable working capital in order to collect a debt now instead of at the end of the proposed funding period of 10 years?

As stated in a previous part of this letter, it is not only fair but eminently wise—not "unduly liberal"—for the Government to fund the entire indebtedness of these carriers put upon them during the war and under the circumstances above mentioned, when they had no opportunity to provide capital funds by the issue of long-time obligations. Instead of doing this the pending bill, as it now stands, absorbs for the immediate payment on account of this capital indebtedness many millions of current assets badly needed by the carriers in the emergency of tangled finance and resumed transportation duties which confront them.

It may be safely assumed that if there is any carrier so exceptionally situated financially as to be able to pay any part of its capital indebtedness out of its current assets, it will gladly do so for funding for a period no longer than 10 years is by no means attractive to those who can do anything else.

Very sincerely and respectfully, yours,

ALFRED P. THOM.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired upon pending amendments. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have more time to debate this.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on section 205 and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman include in that request that the time be equally divided between those in favor of the amendment and those against the amendment, and not have it all taken up by one side?

Mr. ESCH. It was my intention to have the control of the time in the Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, on account of the great importance of this matter, will not the chairman make it one hour?

Mr. ESCH. I was hoping we might make progress——

Mr. SIMS. Make it 40 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Very well. I make the request, then, that debate on section 205 and amendments thereto be limited to 40 minutes, the time to be in the disposition of the Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. It ought to be equally divided.

Mr. ESCH. To be equally divided, but the Chair to deal out the time.

Mr. SIMS. We know best who is against it over here.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state the request. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 205 and amendments thereto close in 40 minutes, the time to be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed.

Mr. ESCH. The time to be controlled by those in favor of the Denison amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and the time of those opposed to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The time to be controlled in favor of the Denison amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and those opposed to the amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we will make better progress if we take a little more time to debate the important elements of this bill than we will to crowd out the proper consideration of elements that are very important, if not vital. [Applause.] There may be lots of things in the bill in connection with which no debate of any consequence will be desired.

Mr. ESCH. I make it one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I would be perfectly satisfied with an hour, and I think that would meet the requirements.

Mr. SNELL, Mr. DEWALT, and Mr. LITTLE reserved the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. I was only going to suggest that the time be extended to one hour instead of being limited to 40 minutes, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] who, I understand, is opposed to the Denison amendment to the bill, control the time on that side in opposition.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes, sir. Further, in regard to that matter, I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and also addressing the Chair and reserving the right to object, I do not think the disposition of the control of time is at all fair to the opponents either of the Denison amendment or to the idea of striking out entirely section 205. The gentlemen who are opposed to striking out section 205 and who are also opposed to the Denison amendment, are in favor of the Merritt amendment, which is now incorporated in the bill, and yet the disposition of the time is given entirely to the opponents of the Merritt amendment. I do not think that is a fair disposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin modifies his request. Will the gentleman state his modified request?

Mr. ESCH. The request is that the debate on section 205 and amendments thereto close in one hour, to be equally divided by those in favor and those opposed; those in favor of the Denison amendment to have their time in charge of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and the time of those opposed put in charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate on section 205 and all amendments thereto close in one hour, the time to be equally divided between those opposed and those in favor of the Denison amendment, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will take their seats until the Chair states this unanimous-consent request.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 205 and all amendments thereto close in one hour; that those in favor of the Denison amendment shall be yielded time by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]; those opposed shall be yielded time by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and that the time shall be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed to that amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on section 205 and amendments thereto close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that debate on secton 205 and amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to amend that motion?

Mr. DEWALT. I desire to amend that by making it an hour and one half, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that all debate shall close at the end of one hour and a half on section 205 and all amendments thereto.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. Do I understand if this motion is carried, and if my amendment should not carry, that there would not then be time left to offer perfecting amendments on the present provision in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the vote would come on all pending amendments at the end of one hour and a half. If any amendments are to be offered, they should be offered during the time fixed by the committee. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DEWALT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—yeas 102, noes 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DEWALT. As I understand the parliamentary situation now, the control of the time would be with the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be by unanimous consent unless other disposition is made.

Mr. DEWALT. That being the situation, I——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is nothing in order now except the original motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The question was taken, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary situation being as it is, I now ask unanimous consent that the time stipulated, to wit, one hour and a half, be divided equally and the control thereof be one half with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and the other half thereof with myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] asks unanimous consent that debate be in control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], to be equally divided. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to state a few moments ago, in response to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], that any additional amendments should be offered during this hour and one-half of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. For debate.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, for debate. It will be in order at the conclusion of debate to offer amendments; but they will not be debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understood the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], it was whether, after his amendment was voted down, they could then debate other amendments. The Chair stated that all debate on amendments would come within the hour and a half. Of course, amendments can be offered after the hour and a half has expired on section 205, but no debate can be had after the expiration of that time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this is very important legislation. There will unquestionably be considerable litigation in regard to it. It is very essential that this language should be so plain and simple that the courts can construe it without difficulty and diverging results. I can not think of anything that could be more obscure and scattered than this section 205, though I approached it with a desire to support it. Let me read to you, on page 10, line 6:

With interest at the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the "standard contract."

Just think of a lawyer writing a law and putting in an alternative. Which of them is going to govern? Who is going to decide? You have a lawsuit on your hands in a minute as to what the rate of interest will be. Suppose it is 4 per cent in section 4 or 5 per cent in section 7. Which should govern? In a case like that the court would almost certainly hold that the contract was so indefinite that nobody would be compelled to pay any inerest whatever, and that would be the result of that legislation.

You can not, for example, say that a note is payable to Jones or to Smith and make it collectible from anybody. You can not say that a note shall be $400 or $500 and compel anybody to pay it. You should not draw legislation that way. Suppose you trace sections 4 and 7 to their sources and analyze that—"with interest at the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal-control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract." There is no interest rate fixed in section 4 of that Federal-control act, absolutely none. It is a rate of such and such per cent as a lump sum whatever is allowed them. No rate per annum is suggested and interest is not even named. This says, "the same rate per annum as that fixed by the President as reasonable under section 4 of the Federal-control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract." The President does not fix anything about that paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract. The Director General of Railroads fixes the interest under paragraph (d) of section 7. The President has nothing to do with fixing interest under it, and it has no application at all.

What is that standard contract? That is not a law. That is a blank contract, gotten up by nobody knows who. Nobody knows what it means. They are going to refer us first to a law and then to a contract before we can even guess what this law means. Why did they not write this section so a man could know what the law is as soon as he reads the section? They say the rate shall be fixed by the Director General as fixed by him "on each occasion." There might be ten thousand different occasions, and the rate might differ on each occasion; and you are asked to make a law to the effect that the rate of interest shall be that which has been fixed upon by the Director General in some ten thousand contracts with similar companies, and he might fix a different rate in each. It does not mean anything.

If this were drawn with the purpose of making it impossible to collect any interest from these people, it would probably answer the purpose.

This committee is a great committee, many of whom are learned lawyers. I am sure that some of them could readily draw a provision that would meet that difficulty and make the provision mean what they probably meant. If some clerk has been left to undertake that, they had better undertake it themselves.

There are three such places in this section 205; there will be fifty references to other laws necessary in this bill and a thousand references to other contracts required, and more than that, before any court could pass intelligently upon this section, and I defy any man to take this bill and tell the House just what the first paragraph of 205 means.

In order that there may be no question as to the force of section 4 of the Federal-control act and paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract, here they are: Section 4 of the Federal-control act is found in the Fortieth Statutes at Large, page 454, and reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the just compensation that may be determined as hereinbefore provided by agreement or that may be adjudicated by the Court of Claims shall be increased by an amount reckoned at a reasonable rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions and betterments, less retirements, and upon the cost of road extensions to the property of such carrier made by such carrier with the approval of or by order of the President while such property is under Federal control.

This section states that after just compensation to the railroads has been determined, that "shall be increased by an amount reckoned at a reasonable rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions," and so forth. It says nothing of any interest or of any annual charge. The President may add a reasonable per cent in one lump sum. This was evidently inserted hurriedly without any comprehension of its purpose and force. The law undertakes to say that the interest shall be "the same rate per annum" as that fixed by the President in this section 4, but he does not fix any rate per annum or any interest at all in the section 4, and its insertion here serves no useful purpose, makes no law to be followed, but simply riles the water so that a legal question must be precipitated into the courts before anything is settled.

This paragraph (d) of section 7 of an "agreement between the Director General of Railroads, ——— company, and other corporations" is found only in a lot of contracts or blanks floating around somewhere, and reads as follows:

(d) Upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements in connection therewith, and upon the cost of road extensions made to the property of the companies during Federal control, the director general shall, from the completion of the work, pay the company a reasonable rate of interest, to be fixed by him on each occasion. In fixing such rate or rates he may take into account not merely the value of money but all pertinent facts and circumstances, whether the money used was derived from loans or otherwise, provided that to the extent that the money is advanced by the Director General or is obtained by the companies from loans or from the proceeds of securities the rate or rates shall be the same as that charged by the Director General for loans to the companies or to other companies of similar credit.

In this section 205 they ask us to pass, we are told that the rate of interest the debtors are to pay the Government will be that "fixed by the President under section 4 of the Federal control act or under paragraph (d) of section 7 of the standard contract, but when you read this paragraph (d) I have just cited there is not a word about the President in it, and he does not fix any rate of interest in it, and there is nothing to guide a man reading this bill to any rate of interest under paragraph (d). Under leave to revise, I ask attention to the Director General's letter, which I had not seen when I began speaking, on page 8407 of yesterday's RECORD. He says there are at least two methods in use under paragraph (d), and under one the Government would lose. So when we trace these two sections to their sources we reach a foundation of nothing. Neither of them fixes any rate of interest by order of the President, and therefore this reference falls to the ground and has no force and effect. In other words, this does not attempt to fix any rate of interest whatever to be paid. It says that the rate shall be the same as that fixed somewhere else where none is fixed.

If it be suggested that the Director General is an appointee of the President, and they had him in mind when they said the President, I answer, "Why did not you say so then and make it clear?" You did not say Director General because you did not mean Director General. The writer simply guessed at what was said in this paragraph (d) and let it go. That is no way to draw this character of legislation, so sweeping in its consequences to the American people and American business interests.

But if I should admit for the sake of argument, which I could not, that you meant Director General when you say President, you are no better off. This paragraph (d) says "pay the company a reasonable rate of interest to be fixed by him on each occasion." Each occasion! Why, there will be thousands of such settlements, and the Director General might fix a different rate of interest in every one, and before a court could even begin to determine the effect and purpose and intention of this law it would be compelled to listen to the evidence on the rate of interest on every one and to investigate every one, and when all the facts were before it which one would the court hold to be the proper rate for these railroad people to pay the Government? There is no way in the world any man could learn what rate of interest is meant by this bill if it should become a law. You can not make a good law by constantly referring the reader to some other law. You should write this law so that the court can learn from it what you meant without looking in some other book. Assistants who have not learned that are of no assistance.

So far as I am concerned I would not argue with the committee as to the amount, but would be willing to leave to their best judgment what the rate of interest should be that the railroads should pay the Government for 10 years, but I do insist that some rate of interest be fixed. It is not absolutely essential that it shall be named as an amount, but something must be said by which a man could easily ascertain what per cent of interest is expected or by which the power is lodged in some individual to fix a definite rate.

If it be suggested that the President under this section 205 can fix a rate, I call attention to the fact that nowhere in this paragraph is he authorized to fix a rate. This is not a permissive act undertaking to empower him to decide the rate of interest. On the contrary, this paragraph of section 205 explicitly undertakes to say that the interest shall be such as has previously been decided somewhere else, and by its very terms makes it impossible for the President or anybody to name a rate.

This paragraph of section 205 says that it may be one rate or another, but I think every lawyer on that great committee will see at a glance that such a contract would be no contract at all and would be void, and that such a law would be no law at all. If they had said that the President could make the rate either 4 per cent or 5 per cent or 6 per cent, according to his best judgment, that would have been sufficient to cover the ground, but they simply state that it shall be one thing or another, and nobody is given the authority to say which shall be the rate. This paragraph means nothing, has no force, and would not compel these debtors of the Government to pay one cent of interest. If some court should take the bull by the horns and decide that it did mean something, there would probably be about as many different conclusions as there were different courts. In any event no judgment could be reached and no decree announced until the close of long and complicated litigation in many legal forums. Too many times the committees leave to clerical hands the preparation of sentences which presently we see are of the highest importance. This bill, when it becomes a law, will by its terms touch many of the greatest interests of the people of this country and this particular sentence should have been drawn by some one so skilled in the law and its practice in the courts that it would not ever become necessary to go into court to determine its meaning and intention. In the course of this debate, which I have the pleasure of opening, it is to be hoped that some advocate of this clause will undertake to explain what rate of interest is meant or who is to decide what the rate shall be and to tell us what this paragraph actually means. This legislation should be direct and simple and in good plain English, so that people could understand it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions involved here. One is whether or not the Government shall charge a greater rate of interest than it is willing to pay. There can be no doubt about what ought to be done, if we want to do the right thing, and that is that the Government ought not to charge more than it pays.

The next question arises whether $1,147,000,000, expended by the Government of the United States during the period of Government control, shall be considered a part of the current indebtedness of the railroads to the Government and deducted in the settlement, or whether we are to take into consideration the fact that if the railroad companies themselves controlled the railroads during the period when these improvements were made they would undoubtedly have been able to borrow money on long time and issue their securities therefor with which to make the improvements.

Now, the mere fact that the Government took control of the railroads during the war and made the improvements without consultation with the owners of the railroads does not justify the Government at this time in embarrassing the people whose roads it has by compelling them to pay in cash for permanent improvements for which they would have been able to get long-time credits if they had completed the business transaction over which the Government took control. That is a simple proposition.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I can not yield in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. The question arises, Are we going to turn the railroads over to the owners so that they can operate them, or are we to throttle the roads by preventing them from having the current revenue with which to operate the roads efficiently? And are we to be just or unjust to the roads?

This is the question in which the people of the whole United States are interested. I apprehend that there is no man anywhere in the United States who would be willing to say, if the responsibility were placed upon him, that he would want these roads turned back to the owners in a crippled condition. All current obligations between the roads and the Government ought to be settled by offsets; but all permanent obligations, such as those created for improvements and betterments, ought to be funded if we are to be just.

There is the whole question. Are we willing to be just, and are we willing to do for these people whose roads we control what they would have been able to do for themselves if we did not control them? Is not that the case? If it is, there is only one thing left to do, and that is to defeat the Denison amendment and approve the recommendation of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems a little inconsistent in the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] who, on yesterday, complained that the Government of the United States was losing such a large amount by reason of Federal control that he should come in to-day and urge that, in addition to that, we allow the railroads to keep all the money that they owe the Government and compel the Government to pay the roads all the money that it owes them.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman fairly states the position that I took.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am putting my interpretation on the gentleman's language.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is a fair interpretation.

Mr. BARKLEY. On day before yesterday, during the general debate, I called attention to what I considered to be the injustice of this thing to the Federal Government. Gentlemen, while we are trying to be liberal and generous with the railroads in this bill, I can not overlook the fact that we owe some duty to the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.] Now, the difference between the plan as presented in the bill and the plan suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], which was the original section as offered by the subcommittee after consulting with the Railroad Administration and the representatives of the railroads themselves in considering this section, amounts to practically $250,000,000, exclusive of certain items unnecessary to detail. Under the bill as it is now written the amount which the railroads will be able to fund, both in long-term fundable notes and in the demand notes for indebtedness on current account, is $779,000,000; and if the bill as it is written is adopted by the Committee of the Whole and then adopted by the House, the amount that the roads will be permitted to keep that they now owe the Government will be $779,000,000 in addition to the amounts carried in the standard contract.

Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is adopted, the amount which they will be able to fund, including the other indebtedness, which is to be represented by demand notes, will be $587,000,000, outside of the amount which has already been advanced to the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine, which amounts to $68,000,000, which is already cared for by long-term obligations and other items on current account, I believe; and their indebtedness, including indebtedness for current accounts which the Government has advanced to the railroads, the amount fundable under the Denison amendment would be $360,000,000, whereas the amount fundable under the bill as it is now written would be $641,000,000, exclusive of certain long-term advances and other indebtedness. In a statement which I received yesterday, and which other members of the committee received, from Mr. Sherley, director of finance under the Federal administration, this takes into account $279,000,000 which is to be left in the treasury of these railroads for working capital, which is practically the amount they claim that is necessary for one month's operating expenses.

Now, gentlemen, it seems to me that we have gone far enough when we continue for six months the standard return which they have been receiving from Federal control, continue present rates, and loan them money for five years.

It is idle to speculate, as the gentleman from Illinois seems to do, that if the Government had not taken over these roads they would have been able to have expended all the money that has been necessary for capital expenses by borrowing the money. It is not true that in the past the railroads have borrowed all the money that they put into capital account, which is represented by extensions and betterments of roads and equipments; but the gentleman from Illinois and those who represent the bill as it is now written, seem to predicate their objections to the Denison amendment upon the assumption that if the roads had not been taken over by the Government all the capital account would have been borrowed money on long terms. Now, that is not true, because, although the roads borrowed some of their money in ordinary times to build extensions and equipment and betterments, it does not follow that they borrowed all the money. Very frequently prosperous roads, that will be unnecessarily benefited by this bill as it is now written, are able to invest in betterments and extensions and equipment from money that they earn from current funds or from their surplus.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not the time to yield.

Mr. PARKER. You made a statement about the money——

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not yielded, but I will permit the gentleman to ask his question.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman made the statement that under one plan the Government would loan the railroads $250,000,000, did he not?

Mr. BARKLEY. I said the difference between these two plans represents practically $250,000,000 on the side of the Government.

Mr. PARKER. I beg to correct the gentleman's figures.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman will have time, and I hope he will take it.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman does not take into consideration the short-time notes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; I do. I take into consideration $138,000,000 which is represented by demand notes.

Mr. PARKER. It is $16,000,000 on one side and $158,000,000 on the other.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, if the Denison amendment is adopted, the difference in behalf of the United States Government will amount to practically $250,000,000; and if it is not adopted, we must raise that $250,000,000 either by taxing the American people or by selling more bonds in order to get the money for the Treasury to allow the roads to keep that money which they now have. Now, as a business principle, as I pointed out the other day, the roads that do not need this money will be the ones very largely to get it. Under the language of the bill all that a road needs to do to keep what it owes the Government is to make the request. It does not depend upon the necessities of the road, and many of the more prosperous roads, which have perhaps more money now due them from the Government than the less prosperous roads—because the less prosperous roads have had to call on the Government from time to time for advances on the standard compensation to enable them to pay their expenses and carry on their operations—the net result will be that this $250,000,000 that the bill as it is now written permits the roads to keep will be for the benefit of the more prosperous roads, which have not been compelled to ask these advances of standard compensation, and the money is now in the Treasury due them by the Government. It certainly seems to me that even if any given road on the next day after Federal control ceases had to go back to the Government and borrow money for a term of five years it would be better to square the account arising out of the Federal control and offset these accounts, as far as possible, even if the road which is compelled to offset the amount is compelled the very next day to borrow money from the Government for a long term or for five years. I say that for this reason: In the first place, you wipe the slate clean of all transactions arising out of Federal control, and, in the next place, you compel these roads to pay the Federal Government the same rates of interest for the money that they get under that account that other roads will pay that come in and borrow afterwards from the Government, because we provide 6 per cent here, and under the bill as it is now written this additional amount may be kept by the roads at a rate as low as 5 per cent or 4½ per cent or such other variable rate as may be fixed under the standard contract for money advanced or as a return upon the amount of betterments and additions chargeable to capital account.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BENSON].

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want, if I can, to try and make this situation clear as to facts. Anyone who knows anything about financing and accounting of public-service corporations knows that there is a distinction between capital investment and operating expenses, and that if you attempt to pay for capital investments out of current operating receipts, where you have a regulation of rates, and attempt to give the carrier sufficient money to carry on its business, then you have got to raise the rate.

The very purpose that my distinguished friend who has just spoken has in behalf of the people in this country will not be realized if you make the capital investment of the railroads a set-off against operating revenue. It can not be done. It is not allowed in your income reports. You know that when you pay your income tax, if you make a capital investment, you can not charge it to ordinary expenses. When they make up an income tax the railroads will not be allowed to do so; when they go before the Interstate Commerce Commission to ask an increase of rates they will not be allowed to put in as operating expenses the capital investment forced on them by the Government.

Therefore, as a matter of fact, if we do not help them to finance at this time these capital investments they will have to go into the market at the present high rate of money and finance them themselves. And the inability to do so is going to put many of the railroads into the hands of receivers.

There are some parts of the argument made by the gentlemen on the other side that, I think, are unfair, because they attempt to make it appear that the railroads are going to have more money in their hands than they ever had before.

On page 11 it is provided that there shall be an offset of what the railroads owe the Government as against what the Government owes them, to the extent of any excess over our contract with the railroads to pay them their operating expenses and such dividends as they have earned during the period they had arranged in the contract prior to the war. If there is any excess due by the railroads to the Government, it will be paid, even though it is on capital account, except allowing for sufficient to pay their debts and dividends on the average that you gentlemen in previous legislation have already agreed to do.

Therefore, gentlemen, it seems to me that if we are going to turn the railroads back—and it seems to be the unanimous opinion of Congress that it is better to have them operated under private control than Government control—turn them back in such a way that they will not be crippled, in such a way that they can go ahead and prosper; and when a railroad prospers the people prosper, because when you take the railroads and the allied interests, the people who furnish supplies to the railroad, it is by far the greatest industry in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the arguments that are made for section 205 as it now stands are that the betterments and the improvements, if they had been made by the railroad companies, would have been done by the issue of long-term bonds and that therefore it is unfair for the Government at the end of the Federal control to force the railroads to settle for these betterments and improvements now.

Mr. BENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. No; I can not; I have only five minutes. That argument is fallacious for this reason: The Government and the railroads have been running along for two years. The Government owes the railroads money and the railroads owe the Government money. When we come to a settlement under the Federal control act everything in the world should be done to make the settlement final and complete. If there is any virtue in the argument of gentlemen on the other side, then I submit that the betterments can just as well be bonded after the railroads regain control of their lines as they could have been bonded before the betterments were made.

In addition to that we provide in this bill that the Government will loan the railroads money, and, mark you now, gentlemen, that when the Government loans the railroads money the Government dictates the character of securities that the railroads shall give it, whereas if you permit the railroads to fail to settle with the Government at the end of Federal control you have made your Government pay the railroads dollar for dollar, and then you put it in the power of the railroad companies to give to the Government its demand notes for what it owes the Government without any security at all. You permit the railroads to settle with the Government with chips and whetstones, but you compel the Government to settle with the railroads with honest dollars furnished by the taxpayers. Can you justify taxing the people $250,000,000 which, in the very nature of the contract, may be a gift to the railroads?

Read page 10, if you will, lines 15 to 19:

Such indebtedness—

Speaking of what the railroads will owe us—

Such indebtedness will be evidenced, if practical, by first-mortgage bonds of the carrier.

Why, there was never anything written in a bill so deceptive as that.

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I can not yield—because there is not a single railroad in America to-day, from the most prosperous to the most insolvent, but what has outstanding mortgage bonds, and therefore we can not get first-mortgage bonds for what the railroads owe the Government.

You will never get a first-mortgage bond under this bill. It is a deception to have placed it in the bill. You will take in the final analysis, when you come to settle, whatever the railroads offer—remember now, you have already paid the railroads, you have got nothing to negotiate, you have got nothing to figure with them on, you have already paid them, and when you come to negotiate a settlement as to what they owe you, you will take their demand notes, no matter whether they are secured or not, no matter how worthless they may be. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has well been said that this is the most important part, perhaps, of this bill. The discussion of it is not to be considered from the standpoint of antagonism between the Government and the railroads. The railroad transportation of this country is as important almost as the Government itself, and the success and prosperity of our citizens and the welfare of the Government depends upon starting these railroads out upon the right basis. [Applause.] The railroads, if you will pardon the expression, for 10 years past have been sandbagged, while things have been thrust upon them on the debit side while they have had no opportunity to receive the credits. As I understood it, when the President of the United States addressed us when the Adamson law was passed he promised that the Interstate Commerce Commission should remedy certain defects in the then existing rates to meet the new requirements which the increase of wages and the diminution of the hours of labor put upon those railroads.

Now, remember, gentlemen, the carriers' property was taken, not given. We ordered it to be taken. We are the ones to see that a settlement is made in a spirit of equity and fair play. This is not a partisan question. This is a question of equity and justice. One of my colleagues here has spoken about the interest rate. Can there be anything fairer than that which is provided in the bill as reported from the committee? This money called the capital account was expended for betterments, additions, and it is properly separable from the current accounts that were incurred in operation. Now, this capital account covers betterments, for the use of which the Government is bound by contract to pay a certain percentage to the carrier. The power is given to the President or the Railroad Administration to fix the rates of interest that shall be paid for the use of these betterments that have been built at the expense of the railroads. Is not fair play, is not reciprocity for the same rate of interest which the Government allows, to govern the railroads or the carriers when they are called upon to pay interest on these deferred payments—that is, on the money expended for these very betterments?

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I have not the time. This is not a question of uncertainty, as one gentleman argued. It is definite and fixed. Whatever the President says shall be the interest paid to the carriers for the use of these betterments shall be the interest that the carriers must pay on the deferred payments of the cost of these very betterments. Is not that fair play, gentlemen? Now, again, the gentleman from Alabama said——

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not for a minute. Let us put these two claims together—the charges and the credits—and strike a balance and have a settlement now. That is not fair, gentlemen. This capital account for betterments is made by the carriers out of loans; not always so, but scarcely ever made otherwise. The railroads could not borrow the money to make these betterments. The Government advanced it. This represents a capital account, and ought to be considered as a separate item from the current expenses that were brought about on the railroads through Government control and operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman give me three minutes additional?

Mr. DEWALT. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have just one thought in closing. There are other things I would like to say. I want to call your attention to this question of offset. You read your bill, study the provision of the committee reported bill, and you will find that there is a provision for offset down to this extent, that only so much as is required to pay charges due from the carriers to stockholders and bondholders is to be reserved plus one month's operating expenses, and the balance only is to be funded which is left after charging or setting off the indebtedness of the railroad with these exceptions which I have named. The Denison amendment simply changes the time for payment of this account spent for betterments and provides that it shall be divided into 10 equal parts, 1 part of which shall be paid each year beginning five years after discharge of the carriers from Federal control, while the bill as it comes from the committee gives 10 years. Let us give these carriers a fair opportunity again to serve the country and to restore transportation to its normal condition. We will have a better system of transportation than anything that the Government could possibly afford us. Let us give them a chance to start out in their work and not handicap them by requiring payments that are unfair by exacting from them the payment of current funds and so cripple them that they will be unable to borrow money that will be necessary to be expended in improving their roads and putting their equipment in condition fit for use in their work. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, following the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] who has just taken his seat, I want to say, as the gentleman well knows, that any improvements made by the Government exclusively for war purposes is not charged up to the roads at all. The Government loses all that. Now, a permanent improvement is not an improvement consumable in temporary use like equipment. The Government made permanent improvements on these railroads out of the taxpayers' pockets which were not impaired in the use of them by the Government, and if the Government had not made these improvements the roads could not have made them for themselves, as they could not borrow the money, and therefore the owners would have the railroads now on their hands at end of control in a condition that they could not operate them successfully if at all.

Permanent improvements run over many years and, if maintained properly, forever. Are you going to say that railroads ought to be out of the hands of a receiver that can not borrow money to the extent the set-off may require? If we have reached a point in railroading in this country when the Government can not set off against what it owes the railroads what the railroads owe it, we are coming to a pretty pass. Now if the railroads are worth keeping, worth operating, and worth having, why can they not do a little financing for themselves? Who owns them? The stockholders. If the stockholders have absolutely no confidence in the successful operation of their railroads, let them go into the hands of a receiver and be done with it. If they have no confidence in their own railroads, why should we loan them the money that they need to pay for this permanent improvement made by war taxes?

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Now, let me tell you what the Government does and which you voted for. If the Government paid the wife of a soldier or the mother of a soldier more than her monthly allotment or the proper amount, and later it was discovered, the difference would be deducted from her future checks until paid. But when we turn back to the millionaires their railroads, that have had permanent improvements, made for them by the Government, to last for all time to come, if kept up by proper maintenance, you ask that we let the railroads keep all they owe us and to pay the roads all we owe them. Whoever heard of such unlimited generosity?

Now, the subcommittee has been far more liberal to the railroads than I think was proper and just. But what greater argument could there be made against private ownership than for the owners themselves to admit they have not confidence enough in their railroads to make to them a temporary advance on their own credit? Who is to pay this? The overtaxed people. The girl and boy, not having dependents, that have a $1,200 income, must pay tax on $200 in order that we may let stay in the millionaire railroad owners pockets the money they owe the Government. Every laborer in this country whose wages exceed $1,000, or $2,000, if he is married, must pay this war-income tax. Liberty bonds are being sold to-day at a sacrifice by people who borrowed money to save our country and win the war, and these greedy, avaricious railroad owners are not even now willing to pay their own debts incurred for their own permanent benefits, but want to take more money from the widows' and orphans' pockets to pay what they justly owe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE of Vermont having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, informed the House of Representatives that bills of the following numbers and titles, having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, have become laws without his approval:

Presented October 31, 1919:

H. R. 9697. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La.

Also, that on November 13, 1919, the President approved joint resolution of the following number and title:

H. J. Res. 241. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, as I see these two propositions—the Merritt amendment, as written into the bill, and the Denison substitute for it—there is no question of a loss to the Government in either. The railroads themselves, even though already bonded, are still ample security, and they will be able to pay the Government in the end. The Government will not lose on either proposition; so that we may dismiss all this talk about taking money out of the pockets of the taxpayers and handing it over to the "millionaire owners" of the railroads.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I am sorry that I can not in the five minutes allotted to me.

There is a great deal of very gross misrepresentation in picturing the owners of the railroads as being millionaires. On the whole, the owners of the railroads, with very few exceptions, are either relatively poor or are the intermediate, or middle, class of people, who own a few shares each in this road or that. Even if they were rich, it should make no difference. The attempt to appeal to class feeling is entirely out of place in this debate.

If we were now making an agreement de novo with the railroads, we might make a different one. We might even make it as strong as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] proposes. Unfortunately we are not now in the position to start afresh. We are facing the situation as it is, not as it might have been. These roads were taken from their owners for Government purposes. They were operated because the Government needed to operate them in order to win the war. I am not going to say that the capital investment made during Federal control was not properly made in most cases, but it was made by the Government so that it might use the railroads for the benefit of the Government. Now we must turn them back to their owners. Shall we attempt to drive a hard bargain or force one, because we have the power and the railroads have nothing to say? We can impose such a bargain upon them as we see fit. What will be the effect if we do drive a hard bargain or force one? The effect, first, will be upon the successful operation of the railroad itself. Failure to operate successfully affects not alone the stockholder, whether he be poor or rich. The first effect may be upon the limited number of people who are stockholders, and, whatever we may say, their rights are entitled to consideration. The next effect that unsuccessful operation would have would be upon the employees of the railroads, and there are 2,000,000 of these. This large and worthy class of people are entitled to have their interests and welfare considered. The railroads can not pay adequate wages to their employees unless they can be successfully operated. These are important considerations, but the most important of all is what effect it is going to have upon the public. The transportation system of the country is the most important of all elements of our commercial and industrial prosperity. Transportation is the very life-blood of the Nation, and unless these roads can operate successfully their failure will strangle business, with all the ills attendant upon strangulation.

The Government has made large expenditures for permanent betterments and improvements. If these had been made by the railroads themselves under private control they would of necessity have been paid for by the sale of long-time securities. They are properly chargeable to capital account. No railroad or other business would attempt to make large and extensive capital investment from current income. Ordinarily this would be impossible, and yet that is just what is proposed if we are to set off the indebtedness of the Government under the standard contract against the amount of capital investment made by the Government on behalf of the railroads during Federal control. If we do this we shall turn the railroads back to their owners under such conditions that for many of them it will mean disaster. We ought not to do this. Every interest of the public, of the employee, and of the stockholder demands fair, just, liberal treatment of the railroads.

The business and prosperity of every part of the country are linked up with the railroads in a most vital way. In my own section of the country, New England, this is particularly true. We are largely dependent upon the success of our manufacturing industries, and these in turn are dependent in large measure upon successful railroad operation. We must bring our coal and raw materials from a distance, and for the most part by rail. Our manufactured products must be distributed in the same way. All our people are directly or indirectly interested and vitally interested in having the railroads not only returned to their owners but returned under such conditions as will reasonably assure their ability to operate and to give more adequate and efficient service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I will speak now, and I would like the Chair to call me at the end of seven minutes.

Gentlemen, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] says to you that this ought not to be considered as a question between the railroads and the Government. Now, you may disguise the fact, if you want to do so, but I want to say to you that while it is not necessarily a question between the railroads and the Government, it is a question between some of the railroads and the Government. It is a question between the rich railroads and the Government. I say that the question involved here is as to what shall be done with what the Government owes the railroads on their standard return; and the Government does not owe anything very much to any of the railroads on their standard return except to railroads like the Pennsylvania and the Southern Pacific, and other such roads that are known as the prosperous roads. The Government does not owe any money to the weak roads or the poor roads, because they have had to have all their standard return to meet their corporate needs. So this is a question between the wealthy roads and the Government.

Now, then, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and others here, and the railroad executive's attorney, Mr. Thom, in his letter have presented a case to you in which they ask the sympathy of Congress for these wealthy railroads.

What are we doing for the railroads? If I have the time I want to tell you. They try to picture to you that we are going to turn these railroads back with their hands tied and in a helpless condition. Do you know what we are doing? We guarantee to every one of them that they shall earn in the next six months what they earned in the corresponding six months of the three most prosperous years of their history. If for any reason they should fail to earn that amount we would pay the difference to them out of the Treasury and do it as a gift. We are giving it to them. If they do not earn as much as they did in the corresponding six months of the three most prosperous years of their history the Government stands by and says, "We will make you a present of enough to make up the difference." Is that treating them meanly?

What else do we do for them? We say, "Now we are starting you off, and if you happen to run behind in your operations and need some money for improvements and running expenses, come to Uncle Sam and we will let you have what you need at 6 per cent interest. You do not have to go into the market. You have a market already. We will back you. We will let you have what you need."

And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] asks you for sympathy for these roads. Mr. Thom, who addressed you this morning through this letter, is a very able man. He is a most plausible man. He presented that argument to us in the committee, and I want to say to you that it convinced me at first. I got to thinking his way. But when I made a little further investigation I came to a different conclusion, and every one of you, if you were to make a little investigation and get to the bottom of this thing, would not be misled by the plausible argument that my friend Mr. Thom presented here in this letter.

Now, what else are we doing for these railroads, gentlemen? We are turning them back with an absolutely clean slate. There has never been a time in the history of this Government when the railroads did not owe millions of dollars on current account. But we are turning them back owing not a dollar on current accounts. We say, "We stand you on your feet; we start you in your business, not owing a dollar on current accounts. The Government is going to pay all the current accounts against you. The Government, Uncle Sam, will take care of the current bills for materials, and so forth, that you owe. Now you can start anew, in a better condition than you have ever been in since you have been operating as railroads."

Not only that, but the Railroad Administration is going to turn over to all roads, rich and poor alike, current revenues for one month ahead, so as to give them working capital. Not only that, but we are going to go ahead and pay all the outstanding bills. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], or his friend, in a letter to him, has told you that he did not want you to turn the Pennsylvania Railroad back without any working capital. Now, I have looked into that just a little bit. Do you know what this bill will do for the Pennsylvania road if it is passed in the form in which it is reported from the committee? It will give the Pennsylvania Railroad twice as much working capital as that company had before the Government took it over.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I will be glad to.

Mr. ESCH. In that connection I wish to cite just one railroad which had a working capital under its own control of $16,000,000 in June, 1915, and $17,000,000 on December 31, 1917, while under the bill as now presented to the House it will get a working capital of $88,400,000; in other words, more working capital under this bill than that road allowed itself under private ownership and control.

Mr. DENISON. That is true. This puts money into the hands of the wealthy roads; and what will they do with it? They have no current bills to pay, because Uncle Sam will pay them. I will tell you what they can do with it. They can pay out some of it in dividends and thereby increase the market value of their stocks. That is what they will do with it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I think it will not hurt any of the railroads and will be in the public interest if the amendment I have offered is substituted for the refunding provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] says we should sustain his amendment because of several things. The first thing he says is that there is a guaranty upon the return of the railroads. He did not tell you for how long. It is a guaranty for the enormously long period of six months. Now, the gentleman is for that guaranty. He will support it in this committee. He will support it in every vote that he casts throughout the consideration of this bill.

The next point that the gentleman makes is that some of these railroads are rich railroads, and he speaks of that as though it were a crime. Why, we want all the railroads to be prosperous in order that they may do the transportation business of the country efficiently and well, and we do not hold it as a reproach that they are prosperous and that they transport goods promptly and efficiently.

The gentleman next said that we proposed to make a loan. Well, he is for the loan. He is on this committee, and he advocates making that loan, and that is no reason for his urging this amendment. The gentleman says to you that he has made certain investigations which, if he revealed them to this House, would change the whole membership in their views, but he does not reveal what the investigation is, and I take it that we are not going to accept as argument a statement that some particular Member has made some investigation, of which he does not disclose one word or enable us to participate with him in the argument which he has not made but has only in his mind.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, the next thing that the gentleman from Illinois says is that we are going to turn the railroads back with a clean slate. Why does not the gentleman get together those who favor his proposition? The gentleman from Louisiana says we are going to take paper for these debts and that it is to be worthless and that we are to lose the debt; and the gentleman from Illinois says that the railroads are going to have their pockets bulging with money—so much money that they will not know how to spend it except by declaring dividends. Now, which is right? Let them get together and not be so divergent in their views.

Let us take the question as it is presented here. The railroads were seized by the Government for the just and proper purpose of conducting this war to glorious victory, but the railroads were not consulted whether they were to be taken over or not.

They were put into the hands not of men trained in the management of railroads; they were put into the hands of inexperienced men who thought they knew something about politics; and these gentlemen, politicians, who are not railroad men, started to make betterments and improvements. Do you suppose that they were all made with wisdom? Of course not. Take it in the State of Maine, for example. There is one railroad, its most successful railroad, which, I understand, will be wrecked by reason of these improvements; a railroad which has been prosperous throughout its history, which has done its transportation business well, which has paid dividends to its stockholders, among whom are widows and orphans who had invested their savings in its securities, and that railroad has been improved to such an extent needlessly beyond its proper and legitimate needs that it has been improved beyond the prospect of its running successfully in the future.

All these betterments were made at war prices and were made to meet the exigencies of the war. In any such high-priced times the road would have made such improvements only as were absolutely necessary for railroad purposes.

The plan as to reimbursing the Government for moneys expended for these betterments is this: The Government is to be permitted to use the improvements during Federal control on paying interest at a rate to be fixed by itself. This provision is remarkably favorable to the Government. Next, the railroads are obliged to take over these second-hand, used betterments, regardless of whether they were to the advantage of the road or not, at their full war cost. And the only point in dispute is whether the Government will take its pay out of the moneys which the roads need for operating expenses or give the roads the reasonable time for which they would have provided through long-time loans had they made these improvements themselves.

Under all the circumstances disclosed, the Government ought, in fairness, to give the railroads the reasonable time provided in the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I just wanted the name of the road.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I decline to yield. Now, let us remember how these improvements were made. They were made at war cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who proposed the amendment under consideration, has shown the effect which the bill as it now stands would have upon some of the highly prosperous railroads. There seems, however, to have been an impression abroad that hardly any of the railroads were prosperous, and that none of them had ever succeeded in making any great amount of money. I want to call attention to a few figures taken from the balance sheet of a prosperous railroad, so that you may understand something about what it has been doing. I refer to the Union Pacific Railway Co., and I want to admit frankly at this time that the Union Pacific is probably the most prosperous of any great system operating in the country, any system operating over 5,000 miles of railroad. The figures which I give are for the year ending December 31, 1917. The figures of the present time would be even more favorable to the railroad if I had access to them. The balance sheet of the Union Pacific Railway Co. at that time showed that it had been making so much money that in one sense it did not know what to do with it, and had to invest it in stocks and bonds of other companies which had no relation whatever to it. For example, it had over $10,000,000 in Chicago & Alton stock. It had over $22,000,000 in Illinois Central stock. It had over $20,000,000 in New York Central stock. It had a total of the stocks of other companies of over $95,000,000, so that you can see how poverty stricken this railroad was. It had in bonds of other companies over $83,000,000, upon which it was drawing interest in addition to the income which it derived from operating its own road. And the operation of its own road was so prosperous that it was able to carry about one-third of its operating revenue to surplus, and in the last year for which I have the figures here, 1917, it carried to surplus account over $40,000,000. Of course part of that was used in dividends.

Under the provisions of this bill as it stands it has been held necessary by those who have advocated that plan that we should further come to the aid of a railroad like the Union Pacific and add to its working capital. I am opposed to such a provision, and favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three-quarters of a minute.

Mr. DEWALT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, the statement that we are simply to get from the railroads the money that they owe us and pay them what we owe by striking a balance and call it square is a perfectly factitious argument. All that we have loaned to the railroads has been spent on extending tracks, and on various permanent improvements which have not yet paid for themselves, which can not be cashed in. What we owe the railroads is for current services. The same idea would be applied to the case of a man who loaned a thousand dollars to a grocer to start in business, and who then dealt with the grocer. At the end of the month in comes a bill for $25. He can not go to the grocer and say, "You owe me $1,000 and I owe you $25. You pay me $975 and we will be square." He could not get the money. It has been spent for counters and equipment, and it would be impossible to collect it. You could not go to the ticket agent and get a ticket to New York and then ask for nine hundred and eighty-odd dollars because you owed a bond. That is the position.

Ordinarily this money would be borrowed on long-term engagements. We have not made that arrangement with the railroads, but it seems to me necessary that they should be given the time which they normally would take to pay loans obtained in the general market. The railroads can not go out to-day and borrow money, because the rate is so extortionately high at the present time that it would be necessary for us to allow the railroads to charge higher rates than the consumer wants to pay. The Government can well afford to take much lower interest than the current rate in the money market. I trust that later on the railroads will be able to borrow the money on better terms.

Railroad capital is very large in proportion to the business done. The turnover is very slow with railroads, much slower than in any other line with which any of us is in the least familiar. It s absolutely necessary that we should turn back the railroads in fairly good condition, in the manner best calculated to make them useful and effective. That is vastly more important than any amount of profit to the Government. The slightest delay, the slightest injury to the railroad service, will cost the country vastly more than the possible interest that we would make by grabbing this money immediately.

Now, as you know, the railroads have been bullyragged for the last 20 years by one side and the other. There have been 48 State commissions that have been interfering, that have injured the railroads, that have thrown a monkey wrench into the machinery on every occasion when they could, through politics, local interest, prejudice, and one thing and another, and they have certainly prevented the railroads from being administered in a way best calculated to serve the community.

Now, it seems to me we must stop this process of railroad baiting. We must not act as though we believed that the railroads are being run by horned devils. They are being run by intelligent business men who are trying to get as much profit as they can, and we must remember that the only way in which a railroad can get any profit is by being a service to the community. If a railroad is not useful, it does not make money. The railroads want to get money, and the only way they can get it is by serving the community.

The railroads must go on, and I do not think that their development should be hampered by lack of funds. They should have the money that they need, and they should be under Federal control, freed as much as possible from the power of local railroad boards inspired by local interests. A national industry should be under national control; no problem which affects the whole country should be governed by less than the entire Nation.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I am for the Denison amendment, believing that the adoption of that amendment will not only deal justly but even generously with the railroads of the United States. I am persuaded to that belief by reason of the testimony that was presented to the committee, and the fact that the statistics that were supplied to the committee justify the policy which the subcommittee recommended to the full committee.

There is some confusion in regard to the matter of working capital. The bill as recommended by the subcommittee takes care of that situation satisfactorily, and as it ought to have been taken care of under the standard contract. Under the bill as reported to the House there are discrepancies resulting in such generous treatment to the strong roads as to make the plan suggested in the bill unjust and unreasonable, in my opinion. I wish to call attention to a road which we may designate as road No. 3. That road in its practice while it was under private ownership and control June 30, 1915, had a working capital of only $2,600,000. On December 31, 1916, it had a working capital of $7,600,000, while on December 31, 1917, the working capital was $3,600,000. That is the amount of capital it established itself. Under the bill as reported to the House that working capital will be increased to $9,800,000, or almost three times the amount that it maintained and established itself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, we have but one more speech on this side and we prefer to close the debate.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let us try, if possible in this matter, to view it, in the first place, with a clear business understanding of the situation, and, secondly, without any prejudice. I am quite well aware of the fact, not only because of past legislative experience, but because of past general business experience, that there is a prejudice against corporations. Be it well founded or ill founded, it exists. I beg the membership of this committee that they absolve from their minds any prejudicial view in that regard. I recognize that the first thing to be considered is the interest of the public. Some gentlemen have said here it is the interest of the Government. What is the Government? The Government is the aggregation of the people residing in this country, namely, over 100,000,000 of people. Therefore when you speak of the interest of the Government you speak of the interest of the people.

This scheme resolves itself into a clear business proposition. What is it? It may be epitomized and syllogized in this way: The amount paid by the United States Government during the period of the war control in capital expenditure for various railroads in this country amounts to $1,135,000,000 in round numbers.

Of that amount about $360,000,000 will be taken care of by what is called the establishment of a car-trust fund, a bill which is reported to the House and which in the judgment of the committee will undoubtedly pass. That leaves, then, in round numbers to be considered $775,000,000, which must in some way be taken care of. Now, this expenditure was for capital investment, as I say, for betterments, improvements, and necessary repairs from time to time which did not go into the current account of the railroads. Now, follow me just one moment more. The standard return for the last two years of Government control amounted in round figures to $1,800,000,000—$900,000,000 per year in round figures. Out of that money which the Government owed the railroads by reason of the standard return the Government must pay for operating expenses, for dividends, and so forth, $1,430,000,000, leaving then a balance of approximately $370,000,000 which must be taken care of. Added to that there are $65,000,000 of current bills and expenses which must be taken care of, making a total of $435,000,000. Added to that, or rather subtracting that from the $775,000,000, of which I have just spoken, we have $330,000,000 to be funded according to this refunding proposition, or we have the other sum of $775,000,000 to be funded. Now, which shall it be? That is a clear business proposition. Now, I grant you that prima facie the argument is all one way. If I owe John Jones $10, and John Jones owes me $8, then the clear business proposition is this: He pays me what he owes me, and I pay him what I owe him, and we strike a balance by my paying him $2, and that is the way a balance is usually made. Now, that is prima facie correct, but that is not so here now. Why is it not so? Every rule has its exception; every rule is best proved by the exceptions thereto. What is the reason for the exception? In the first place, this is capital investment. Made how and by whom? By the volition of the railroad companies? No; by the command and behest of the United States Government during war time. Not all of it, but a majority portion of it, occasioned and demanded by war necessities, made so by reason of the edict of the Director General or the President of the United States, and these betterments and improvements to this enormous extent of $1,135,000,000 in large part were occasioned by the command of the Government of the United States.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DEWALT. That is one reason for the exception. Now, what is the other reason? There is not a business man in this House, there is not a lawyer in this House who has ever had any dealings with business men who does not know this as an established fact, that you never pay, except you have an extraordinarily profitable business, for permanent improvements and betterments out of your current expenses, from your current account. You pay it out of your surplus fund, if you have any, or you charge it up to capital account. That is good business method and that everybody knows. Now, what this provision of the bill is doing or is trying to do is this: It is trying to say to the Government, you made us make these improvements in large part, you made us make them when we could not borrow the money, because you had borrowed it all yourself in Liberty bonds, and so forth; and now we ask you to do what we would have done if we had had the power, namely, we would have borrowed the money and made a capital investment, and now we ask you to fund this amount—the difference between $435,000,000 and $775,000,000—not give us the money but fund it in the way we propose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for eight and three-quarters minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is a peculiar pleasure to follow the member of the Interstate Commerce Committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] in that he knows, according to my judgment, the subject he is talking about. I have felt after listening to much conversation and declamation here on the floor that some men have not known what they were talking about. You must not expect me to indulge in any airy persiflage; you must not expect me to rely solely upon lung power; you must not look to me to be a profaner of the millionaire railroads nor on the other hand to be a contender for or against the great number of other roads which are not millionaire roads. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] has very accurately described the situation that really exists, so that we can come to a discussion of the funding without any delay. Accept his word, if you please, as if spoken by me. The question of method is the only one involved. Either one is respectable, I think, or at least I did think so entirely until I heard the remarks of some gentlemen on the subject, but at all events I will accord a full measure of sanity and respectability to the proponents of the provisions in the bill. I feel that there is much sanity marking the method set forth in the amendment. As my committee associate, Mr. DEWALT, has said, as a commercial proposition in respect to financing permanent improvements one would expect that long-time provision would be made. To that I will agree. But here is a case of financiering between the Government of the United States and the railroads the like of which was never known in the history of the world. It does not follow the regular methods of banking or commerce in any vital particular; the case of every railroad is complete unto itself. The $435,000,000 which may or may not be subtracted, according as we vote here, does not represent any scientific distribution of revenues among the railroads of the country.

If we subtract that amount, we are then free in the adjustment of loans hereafter to treat each road as it deserves, on its own peculiar merits; but if we fund the amount and pay the railroad we may throw it in the hands of a few, and that unquestionably will throw it in the hands of the rich railroad, and the other fellow will have to come around and borrow just the same. It means we divert some money, more or less, from the Treasury of the United States into the hands of those who may not need it, and then under the remaining provisions of the bill we still have to go out and provide by loans for those who do need it, thereby increasing the amount involved. Once we have parted with $435,000,000 and paid it to these roads, it is gone for 10 years, as provided in the bill. Then we will have to go out and take care of the weaker roads, or any road which may not get the benefits from that amount paid over, and finance them. The difference in the amount of money to be divided between the two plans is $280,000,000; but do not think I would be so specious in my suggestion as to lead you to think that that $280,000,000 will necessarily be saved to this Government. It probably will not. It will go from the $280,000,000 which is planned to be withheld in the first instance down into making a provision for a revolving fund, or whatever it may be, for any loans which may be taken out under the privileges of that fund.

Here is the question, and that is all there is to it. There is no use of blackguarding either side. It is fruitless to say that one plan is the only plan. It is a straight question of business method. If you want to say you will pay $435,000,000 to whatever roads it happens to fall into, you want to follow the bill. If you prefer to say, on the other hand, that you are perfectly willing that such roads of the country as need the help, and so all together shall have the use of the $435,000,000, then you want to vote for the amendment.

The rate-of-interest question is very much involved. It is a tremendous proposition, and I have not yet heard a man who has spoken here tell all the facts about it. I do not think they have been trying to evade it; I doubt if they know. The proposition is just this: In the amount of money involved, which was spent by the Government for the railroads and which is considered under the interest rate, is a certain percentage for improvements and betterments, and so forth, not chargeable to capital account. If the current rate of interest between the Government and the railroads for all transient transactions has been 6 per cent back and forth, it is as standard as anything could be during two years. The reason why the lower rate may be made in favor of the railroads is due to the fact that a lot of that money has not been earning anything. The administration would undoubtedly be willing to allow the railroads to be charged 6 per cent, and allow that as an earning rate to the railroads, if all money represented improvements which have had an earning power. But a lot of the money has gone into steel bridges and into iron telegraph poles to replace wooden ones in certain places. They may improve the looks of the property, but they do not earn any more. On that kind of capital invested the administration very wisely says that they are not entitled to a full 6 per cent rate of interest. They are negotiating; and anybody who has been familiar with this all along knows that there is a discussion on between the Railroad Administration and the railroads as to the exact rate of interest to be charged the roads in the account in question.

The elements that enter into productive and unproductive investment have not been determined. If they should decide on 5, or 4, or 3 per cent, it would be because they took those two elements into account, and it should not be regarded as a standard rate of interest.

We want to be just and we want to be generous to the railroads to the limit. We do not, however, want to fool away any extra money. The Government must turn the roads back in as good condition as it found them in, and return their supplies in kind—pay for them a present value. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to strike out and insert.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 134, noes 69.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, having adopted the motion to strike out and insert, the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] to strike out the section falls thereby. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXISTING RATES TO CONTINUE IN EFFECT.

SEC. 206. All rates, fares, and charges, all divisions of joint rates, and all classifications, regulations, and practices in anywise changing, affecting, or determining any part or the aggregate of rates, fares, or charges, or the value of the service rendered, which immediately preceding the termination of Federal control are in effect on the lines of carriers subject to the commerce act, shall continue in force and effect until thereafter changed by or pursuant to authority of law; but this shall not be construed as affecting the rights of any party to a proceeding involving rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices which has been or may be instituted under the commerce act or other law.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Insert after the word "by," in line 23, page 12, the words "State or Federal authorities."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the committee's attention to the provisions of section 206. It provides that:

All rates, fares, and charges, all divisions of joint rates, and all classifications, regulations, and practices in anywise changing, affecting, or determining any part or the aggregate of rates, fares, or charges, or the value of the service rendered, which immediately preceding the termination of Federal control are in effect on the lines of carriers subject to the commerce act, shall continue in force and effect until thereafter changed by or pursuant to authority of law.

You will observe that the language is "pursuant to authority of law."

The rates that are now in force will remain in force and effect after the roads go back to private ownership, and the question naturally arises as to the authority of the State commissions to change or modify intrastate freight or passenger rates. The language used is "pursuant to authority of law," and it was the intention of the committee and the drafters of the bill that when the roads were turned back to private ownership the State commissions should have power to change and modify intrastate rates, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have authority to change and modify interstate rates. And it is only because of the construction that might be placed upon the language in this section that I have offered this amendment. The amendment is inserted after the word "by" in line 23, and consists of the words "State or Federal authorities." It makes the proposition clear that it is the intention of Congress that the State commissions will have jurisdiction over rates, fares, and charges as to intrastate business. It prevents any other construction being placed upon it. I do not understand that the chairman of the committee has any objection to this amendment.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This carries out the effect of the legislation passed by Congress six weeks ago in the so-called Cummins bill—S. 641?

Mr. SWEET. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of asking a question. We all desire to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. SWEET. It is only to clarify and make certain the language of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I have a little apprehension about the interpretation that may be put upon the gentleman's language. All these charges include rates on interstate commerce as well as rates on intrastate commerce. By merely inserting the words "by Federal or State authority," do not you leave it somewhat in doubt whether a State authority might pass upon an interstate rate or the Interstate Commerce Commission might pass upon an intrastate rate? Should there not be some definite language inserted, expressing the jurisdiction, so that there would not be a concurrent jurisdiction to pass upon interstate and intrastate rates?

Mr. SWEET. No. The language used in the proposed amendment makes it clear that the State regulatory bodies will have jurisdiction over intrastate rates, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission will have jurisdiction over interstate rates.

Mr. BARKLEY. This language was discussed very carefully by the committee and by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. The phrase "by authority of law" of course means whatever authority there is to pass on rates, and it would include both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various State commissions. But if you put them in interchangeably you might lead to the unintentional conclusion that one or the other might pass on one or the other rates.

Mr. SWEET. No; I think not; because it refers back to the word "law," and it makes it clear that it refers to the laws of the States and also the Federal Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I shall offer an amendment of but just one word after your amendment, "by State or Federal authority," by putting in the word "respectively."

Mr. SWEET. I did not get the word.

Mr. BARKLEY. The word "respectively."

Mr. SWEET. I will not object to that.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman if he wants to ask a question.

Mr. SEARS. I would make this suggestion: At the end of the paragraph strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add the following: "Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to include intrastate shipments."

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not the intention. They are continued until the proper State authorities can pass upon them. Otherwise they would go back to the prewar rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to add the word "respectively" after the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SWEET. I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARKLEY to the amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: After the Sweet amendment add the word "respectively."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Sweet amendment as modified by the Barkley amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET as modified by the Barkley amendment: Insert, after the word "by," in line 23, on page 12, the words "Federal or State authorities, respectively."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the addition sought to be made to this paragraph does not clarify it at all. It seems to me it should be left as it is, "until thereafter changed by or pursuant to authority of law." That means, of course, the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission where it applies, and the authority of the State commission where it applies. If we substitute this language, it might seem as if it were alternative.

Mr. SWEET. No. This is as to the construction of the law that is to be in force and effect, and this is a recognition of the fact that the State commission shall have authority over intrastate rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] as amended by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to one matter that I think ought to be considered, but I shall not offer an amendment at this time. Section 206, now under debate, begins by providing "All rates, fares, and charges, all divisions of joint rates," and so on, "shall continue in force and effect until thereafter changed by or pursuant to authority of law." The requirement as to divisions is all right if the divisions referred to are divisions in strict sense, as, for instance, a division of joint rates applicable to a line under Federal control and a line not under Federal control. But if the reference is to division of joint rates applicable to two or more lines under Federal control, it seems to me the provision needs some clarification, some explanation, because the existing division of such rates, as I understand—I am not sure of the correctness of my information—is represented by mileage arbitraries, percentage abitraries based upon mileage, that have been devised for bookkeeping purposes. I suggest to the committee that at the proper time hereafter it will be well to bear that point in mind so as to avoid the possibility of compelling the maintenance of these arbitraries for an indefinite period in effect.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if, where the divisions are between two railroads that cooperate, that is not entirely a matter of contract and there is not any power to regulate what each railroad shall have?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand the purpose of the bill is to maintain the status quo until there is some change under competent authority. All I am saying now is that it would seem inadvisable to go to that full extent.

Mr. ESCH. I think one advantage in including in the section the words "division of rates" is due to the fact that two lines operated by the Government on the lower Mississippi now have a division of rates with the rail line connecting at points like St. Louis. If Federal control ceases, there might be danger that that division of rates, rail and water, might lapse. We wanted to maintain the present status of those divisions when Federal control shall cease.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think that is all right, Mr. Chairman. I approve that, and I am also in sympathy with the purpose to maintain, as provided, the divisions which short lines enjoy. I am talking altogether about the other thing, namely, that arbitrary mileage percentages ought not to be fastened on carriers indefinitely.

Mr. ESCH. I agree with the gentleman in that, and if there is any change by way of amendment which he desires to suggest I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Later on I will be glad to try to present something along that line.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question for information. On page 12, line 25, I wish to know if the words "by or pursuant to authority of law" have been stricken from the bill or if they still remain in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. They still remain in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 207. (a) When used in this section—

The term "carrier" means a carrier by railroad or partly by railroad and partly by water (1) whose railroad or system of transportation is under Federal control at the time Federal control terminates, or which has heretofore engaged as a common carrier in general transportation and competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken and retained possession, use, and control (excepting, however, from such railroads not under Federal control any street or interurban electric railway which has as its principal source of operating revenue urban, suburban, or interurban passenger traffic or sale of power, heat, and light, or both) and (2) which, within 60 days after the termination of Federal control as provided in section 200, has filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission schedules embodying general increases in its rates, fares, and charges;

The term "guaranty period" means the first six months after the termination of Federal control; and

The term "test period" means the three years ending June 30, 1917.

(b) The United States hereby guarantees to each carrier that its railway operating income for the guaranty period as a whole shall not be less than the average of its railway operating income for the three corresponding periods of six months each during the test period. If during such corresponding periods in the test period, averaged together, the carrier had no railway operating income, the guaranty shall be the amount by which any deficit in railway operating income for the guaranty period as a whole exceeds the deficit for the three corresponding periods during the test period, averaged together.

(c) For the purposes of this section the railway operating income for the periods during the test period corresponding to the guaranty period shall be computed in the manner provided for in section 1 of the Federal control act.

(d) In computing railway operating income for the guaranty period for the purposes of this section—

(1) Debits and credits arising from the accounts, called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission equipment rents and joint facility rents, shall be included, but debits and credits arising from the operation of such street electric passenger railways, including railways commonly called interurbans, as are not under Federal control at the time of termination thereof, shall be excluded;

(2) Proper adjustments shall be made (a) in case any lines which were, during any portion of the period of Federal control, a part of the railroad or system of transportation of the carrier, and whose railway operating income was included in such income of the carrier for the test period, do not continue to be a part of such railroad or system of transportation during the entire guaranty period, and (b) in case of any lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with the railroad or system of transportation of the carrier at any time since the end of the test period and prior to the expiration of the guaranty period, for which separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission are not made in respect to the entire portion of the guaranty period;

(3) There shall not be included in operating expenses, for maintenance of way and structures, or for maintenance of equipment, more than an amount fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In fixing such amount the commission shall, so far as practicable, apply the rule set forth in the proviso in paragraph (a) of section 5 of the "standard contract" between the United States and the carriers (whether or not such contract has been entered into with the carrier whose railway operating income is being computed), except that instead of taking the whole of the test period for the purposes of comparison there shall be taken the periods during the test period corresponding to the guaranty period; and

(4) The commission shall require the restatement of the operating expenses (other than for maintenance of way and structures or maintenance of equipment) for the guaranty period to the extent necessary to correct any abnormal charge to such expenses for such period.

(e) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall, as soon as practicable after the expiration of the guaranty period, certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the railway operating income of the several carriers during such period and the several amounts necessary to make good the guaranty to each. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed thereupon to draw warrants in favor of each such carrier upon the Treasury of the United States, which shall be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the amount shown in such certificate as necessary to make good the guaranty.

(f) Upon application of any carrier to the Interstate Commerce Commission, asking that during the guaranty period there may be advanced to it from time to time such sums, not in excess of the estimated amount necessary to make good the guaranty, as are necessary to enable it to meet its fixed charges and operating expenses, the commission may certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of and times at which such advances, if any, shall be made. The Secretary of the Treasury, on receipt of such certificate, is authorized and directed to make the advances in the amounts and at the times specified in the certificate, upon the execution by the carrier of a contract, secured in such manner as the Secretary may determine, that upon final determination of the amount of the guaranty provided for by this section such carrier will repay to the United States any amounts which it has received from such advances in excess of the guaranty. If any such application is made before the carrier has filed with the commission schedules embodying general increases in its rates, fares, and charges, no advances shall be made under this paragraph unless such carrier enters into a contract, secured in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, that if it fails to file such schedules within 60 days after the termination of Federal control it will repay to the United States the amount of such advances, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. No advances shall be made to any carrier after the expiration of 60 days after the termination of Federal control unless it has previously filed such schedules with the commission

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the section. Before that motion is voted upon the committee will vote upon any amendments offered for the purpose of perfecting the text.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have not much to say in support of my motion, because it does not seem to me that it requires much to be said.

This section provides that the so-called standard return shall be continued for six months in favor of such carriers as make application within 2 months or 60 days and file a rate-increase schedule. No other carriers will get the benefit of the standard return. Therefore we know that every carrier which has made the standard return or in excess of it during Government control, or has reason to believe that it will make the standard return during the first six months, will not make any application. Therefore the Government of the United States will not have the benefit that it now has. It now operates all the railroads as one railroad system, and it guarantees a return to them as a whole equal to the return of each road for the best three years of its life—the test period.

Now, if we are going to continue the guaranty at all, we should continue it as to all railroads and take from every road that makes more than the standard return the excess, so as to help take care of those roads that make deficits. The only object of this is to take care of the roads that have every reason to believe that they can not make the standard return. Now, on those roads there will be no incentive whatever during the six months to exercise any economies, to reduce costs of labor, or in the purchase of materials for less than had to be paid during the war. I mean there will be no inducement in the nature of compulsion. Naturally, I suppose, every railroad, even if it expects the standard return to the extent that it does not make it, will do its best to reduce expenses, knowing that after the six months it will have to do so. But suppose that these roads, or any number of them—which may be quite possible—do not make the standard return, and at the end of the six months conditions are such that they can not make it for the next six months. As a matter of precedent and the reason for the guaranty we should continue the same subsidy—for that is all it is—for any subsequent period necessary for the roads that have not made the standard return during the six months to enable them to get where they can make it.

Now, this is simply a case of volunteering to secure profits on the roads after they have been returned to their owners. In other words, we are paying the railroads to take back that which they want and are anxious to have, and then we give the loaning and refunding privileges to take care of them in addition. Any road that has the slightest prospect of making the standard return at the end of six months the Government will loan it any money that it needs during the time and give it a reasonable time in which to pay that loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Now, my friends, this standard return has got to be paid out of the Federal Treasury, in which there is not to-day a net dollar.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman explain just this feature of the matter? We have granted rate increases of about 25 per cent, and I suppose that will amount to something over $1,000,000,000 a year, will it not?

Mr. SIMS. I should think so.

Mr. BLACK. And my understanding is that the wage increases which the Government has given to the employees—I do not criticize them at all—will amount to practically as much as the rate increases. Therefore does the gentleman think that the railroads will be able to meet their interest obligations with the present freight rates or until they are increased?

Mr. SIMS. They might not if the maturing obligations came within the six months, but we will loan them the money if they need it. So that is all out of the way.

Now, the war rates are continued by this bill. The rate would continue until otherwise ordered if it was not in the bill, in my opinion, and then we propose to give them an opportunity to refund anything that they owe under the terms of the bill and loan them any money that they need. Now, why do you want to vote them a pure subsidy?

Gentlemen talk about increased wages. Of course, there has been an increase in wages. There has been an increase in everything more than proportionate to the increase in wages; but we expect a decline in wages if the cost of living and material decrease, but no great decline; but that will be the natural tendency. We will expect and, no doubt, get an economical administration of each individual road by its owners, who will operate it possibly more economically than the roads could be operated under war conditions. Therefore, inasmuch as the Government has no money and we have got to collect it by taxes or borrow it on loans, I do not think we should borrow from the taxpayer by compulsion and give it to a railroad that can not make the standard return during the first six months after it goes back into the hands of its owner, or can not make that which it made in the best three years of its pre-Government control existence.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has just referred to the question of wages. We have imposed, by fiat of law, upon these railroads, which are now about to resume operations under private control, a standard of wages which they never would have made themselves under natural conditions.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is making a statement.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; I am asking a question. The proposition is simply this: We have arbitrarily imposed, by fiat of law, a standard of wages which we now ask them to reach and pay by the natural law of trade. How are you going to reconcile those two propositions?

Mr. SIMS. I have just stated that we have also given an arbitrary increase of rates, and the roads have six months in which to increase rates, and we propose to loan them all the money they need during that time. Therefore the guaranty is a subsidy, nothing but a subsidy. Every public utility in the United States is in the same shape as are the railroads as to wages, though not under Government control.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for maintaining the guaranty for a period of six months must be evident to everyone who realizes the tremendous increase in cost of the operation imposed on the carriers, as was suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, by fiat. The railroads did not have anything to say about the amount or as to the cost of material. That was fixed by governmental agency. The total increase of wages in 1919 through Government agency was practically $1,000,000,000. The increase this year will possibly be larger than that by reason of the fact that the shopmen have recently had an increase granted through the Director General, retroactive to the 1st of May, which will increase the wage scale $45,000,000 per annum.

Now, under these circumstances we felt that we were obligated to maintain this standard return for a period of six months until such time as the Interstate Commerce Commission could adjust the level of rates to meet the increased cost. We are paying the deficit which has occurred under Federal control. We hope that when the roads are returned through the standard return guaranty of six months the commission will adjust the level of rates so as to permit the roads to stand alone. That is why we are putting in the guaranty.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Why six months; why not make it a year? Is it to give the commission an opportunity to adjust it, and does the gentleman think it can be done in six months?

Mr. ESCH. We took it up with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with two months for notice and four months for determination they say that it can be done.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman has stated the increased cost of wages. What has been the result of the increase in the 25 per cent freight rates and the 1 per cent passenger rates?

Mr. ESCH. Between $900,000,000 and $1,000,000,000.

Mr. SEARS. So that it is about the same as the other.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The question of wages is only one of the factors.

Mr. ESCH. I said that the cost of materials and a lot of other facts entered into the matter.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman if he has taken into consideration the fact that at the present time under Federal control they control not only the railroads but the express, and when the roads are turned back the express companies will take the receipts that are now received for carrying local freight?

Mr. ESCH. I have an amendment that will cover that.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman understands what I mean; under the present operation of local freight the business of the country has absolutely broken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I favor the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to strike out section 207 of the bill. It is in that section that provision is made that the Government guarantee to each railroad which has at any time been under Federal control that its income for the first six months after the termination of Federal control shall not be less than its average income for the corresponding periods in 1915, 1916, and 1917. In addition to discussing the amendment to strike out the section, I desire to submit some observations concerning my objections to other provisions of the bill now presented. In its present form I can not vote for the measure, and I desire to briefly point out some of the reasons impelling me to that course.

The Army appropriation bill of 1916, before the United States became engaged in the war with Germany, carried a clause empowering the President to take possession of the railways in time of war. On January 1, 1918, acting under that authority the President took over the railways and has since operated them. During the period of operation of the lines under Government control there has arisen a very general demand that the railways be returned to the owners and to private operation.

The President in May, 1919, delivered to Congress in joint session a message in which he expressed his intention to return the roads to private ownership and control by December 31, 1919. Under existing law the President has ample authority in that regard.

It has also been given out that the return of the roads to the owners will be made whether any new legislation is enacted or not. For my own part, I desire that the roads be returned. I am opposed to Government ownership or operation. I am unwilling for advantage to be taken of the general desire for the restoration to private management to enact legislation unfair to the public interest.

We are then presented with the situation in which the roads will be returned to private ownership and operation either under the same laws and regulations that existed at the time they were taken over or they will be returned under the terms of the pending bill in its present form or as it may be amended during its consideration in the two Houses. The issue is not whether the Government will retain operation and control or restore private ownership and control. That question has already been decided. The only issue with which we are confronted is as to the character of legislation under which restored private ownership and control shall be exercised. Even though this bill, on account of its objectionable features, should fail of passage, Congress is not thereby precluded from enacting any necessary or proper legislation dealing with the subject.

I fancy that among the causes prompting the shippers and the public to form the conclusion that a return should be had to private operation were the decided increases in rates and charges during Government control and the inefficiency with which the lines were operated, resulting in delays, inconveniences, and poor service as compared with former service.

I fancy that it was with some expectation, or at least some hope, that these objections would be removed when the railroads should be returned to the owners that the demand became insistent.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the development of debate on this bill we have been informed that no such roseate expectations may be entertained. We are told that immediately on the return of the roads to the owners the country may expect another advance in freight rates, notwithstanding the rates are already higher than the public has been led to believe they should be. Section 206 provides that all rates in effect at the termination of Federal control shall continue until changed by or pursuant to law. This dissipates any hope of a reduction, not to mention prospective increases.

If gentlemen will analyze subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 207, they will see that under the terms of the bill the railways are invited, if not practically commanded, to file increases in rates within 60 days after the end of Federal control. In subdivision b, section 207, of the pending bill it is proposed that the Government shall guarantee for six months after the end of Federal control that the income of each carrier shall not be less than the average of its operating income during the corresponding six months of the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. In subdivision a, section 207, it is required that a railroad, in order to become eligible to claim the guaranteed return, must, within 60 days after the termination of Federal control, file with the Interstate Commerce Commission schedules of general increases in its rates, fares, and charges. Of course, everyone knows that each railway company will desire to take advantage of the guaranteed return. In order to do so it is required to file schedules of general increases in its rates. All roads will file such increases. The language of the bill, amounting almost to a command to the railways to file increases in rates, is a very strong suggestion, if not a command, to the Interstate Commerce Commission to approve raises of all rates in excess of the present rates under Government control. The fixing of rates in such a manner amounts to legislative rate making instead of judicial rate making by the commission.

We have all believed that the country was to receive from the return of the roads to private ownership either a reduction in rates or more efficient administration of the railways. If the private owners, with the present level of rates, administer the roads more economically and with more efficiency than the Government has administered them, they will naturally have a greater net revenue with which to pay interest on their obligations and returns on investments.

The rates now in force under Government control are from 25 per cent to 40 per cent higher than rates which were in effect under private management. By changes in classification of freight these rates in some instances and on certain commodities and in some sections have been much higher than these ratios. This increase of rates has been reflected in the commerce of the country. To again increase rates upon relinquishment to private control will place an uncommon burden upon the shippers, consumers, and producers of the United States, without, to my mind, sufficient justification, so far as has been disclosed in debate.

We should bear in mind that the standard return or rent paid to the railways during Federal control was based upon the average earnings for 1915, 1916, and 1917, and the average earnings for these years was larger than the average for any three consecutive years to be found in a long previous period. These earnings accrued under the old rates in force prior to Federal operation.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to the Congress guaranteeing the income of the railways for the period of six months immediately following the termination of Federal control as provided in this bill. I am opposed to going into the Treasury and granting to the railways a gratuity or subsidy out of public funds.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to be just to the owners of the railroads. I desire to accord to them the same measure of justice as is accorded other citizens of the Republic. They neither deserve less nor are entitled to more consideration than the owners of other property in the United States. As a Member of Congress, representing a constituency served by the railroads, I do not feel that I should be more than just; be generous with the people's money by voting for a subsidy; with funds not my own to give largess to the holders of railroad bonds. If the roads on reasonable rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission are not able to earn in 1920 as large an income as they earned in 1915, 1916, and 1917, the average of which was high, as has been pointed out, I do not feel that I should vote for an appropriation to make up the earnings to that point. Gentlemen may say that the Government guaranteed the income during Government control. That is true only in a sense. The President took over the roads under the act of 1916. After they had been taken over it was necessary that some rate of rental be fixed for their use. The President had deprived the owners of possession and assumed it himself. The average earnings for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917 was fixed because it was contended that these years being the three consecutive preceding years afforded the best guide as to what the roads would probably earn from January 1, 1918. However, it is quite another thing to continue the guaranty after the roads have been released. It is one thing to take property under a war power and to, at least theoretically, exclude the owners from control, and for the use of such property to pay liberal rent, and quite another thing to guarantee the same rent after the owners have been restored to possession.

Allow me to call attention to another distinction between the two sets of circumstances. During Federal control under the stipulated rentals the surplus which the prosperous roads earned over and above the guaranteed return went into the Federal Treasury for use in paying the deficits incurred by the unprofitable lines. Under the terms of this bill the roads are permitted to retain their entire earnings though in excess of the guaranty, while the Treasury is to be drawn upon to make up the income of those carriers which are unable to produce revenue equal to the guaranteed amount. A guaranty of income decreases the incentive to economy and efficiency of operation. This is especially true when it is recalled that during the period of guaranty the companies enjoying it are enjoined by the bill to file and have pending before the commission increases of rates. Under such circumstances it is not to the interest of the carrier to reduce its operating costs. Declining expenses do not argue for higher rates.

It must be borne in mind that the railways, at the time the Government took them over, were anxious for that course to be adopted. They threw up their hands and stated they were unable to operate the lines. The war needs were such that the President felt it to be imperative that he assume control. There is ample warrant for the belief that the roads were desirous of Government control. While they could not have successfully resisted seizure of their properties, they were not required to accept a rental less than that what was fair and reasonable. The Constitution guaranteed them "just compensation." That compensation was assured by resort to the courts. By voluntarily accepting the rate of rental agreed upon between the Railroad Administration and themselves, they may be assumed to have been satisfied. Indeed, there was a suggestion in the testimony on the bill providing for Government control that the Railroad Administration favored a liberal rental in order to avoid possible litigation with the companies. Practically all of the former officials and operating managers were continued in charge during the period of Government operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. It has been strongly intimated, if not directly charged, that many of the annoyances and inefficiencies arising during Federal control were knowingly caused by circuitous routing of freight, diversions of traffic, and poor car service by the same officials. If such charges be true—and I am frank to say I do not know whether they be true or false—necessarily they resulted in much expense and cost, which should be avoided under private management. It has been charged that these things were done in order to induce the return of the roads upon terms favorable to the owners.

Notwithstanding the anxiety of the roads to be taken over originally, now that we come to the point of handing them back, they again throw up their hands and say, "We can not take them back unless you allow us to continue the rates which the Government has adopted, and allow us to file schedules still further raising those rates."

They throw up their hands and say, "We are not able to operate the properties unless the United States offsets our indebtedness in such a way as to pay us what it owes us, and allow us to owe the Government for 10 years for the improvements and betterments to our properties which it has made."

This was what section 205 of the bill as introduced provided, but I am glad to say that the House, by the adoption of the Denison amendment, has, in a measure, improved that portion of the bill. That amendment requires that $281,000,000 due to the Government, which the original bill provided should be funded for 10 years, shall be offset on final settlement against amounts due the roads on rentals. Mr. Hines, the Director General, in a letter stated that this feature of the bill was too liberal, and suggested the amendment. I supported the amendment, but the bill still permits the funding of large sums due the Government by the roads.

But what else does the bill provide? Let us see if it is not generous, indeed. By the terms of the measure the lines are returned in as good, if not better, condition as when they were received.

The bill provides for new loans to the roads in the sum of $250,000,000 in addition to what the roads may owe the Government for improvements and betterments during Government operation.

Section 205 provides that the railroads shall have the option to refund or extend their indebtedness to the Government for such improvements, additions, and betterments for a period of 10 years or less, in the discretion of the roads. No discretion is retained in the Government or in the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine in what cases extensions or refunding shall be authorized—no power to deny a loan to a company that may not need it or extend a loan to a company that may need it. But the bill gives the absolute option to the companies alone to extend or refund their indebtedness to the United States.

The roads are to be provided by the Government, on credit, with a month's working capital out of the earnings of the railways while under Government control, notwithstanding the fact that, as disclosed by the letter of the Director General, Mr. Hines, the Government at the time it took over control was required to pay maturing bills contracted by the railways and carry them for the companies. Now, in turn, the bill permits them to retain for their own use funds accumulated in the operation by the Government and to owe the Government for same while the Government is still under obligation to meet the maturing bills contracted by it when they become due.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman think that a railroad which had demonstrated its ability that it is prosperous would be silly enough to borrow money from anybody that it did not need.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman that it does not seem in human reason that that would be the case, and yet for two years we have heard all over this country the doctrine preached by gentlemen that the railways were not in a position to float their securities and could not finance their operations, but that the Government, through dire necessity for the required service, must come to their rescue and rehabilitate them. And we hear that same doctrine preached to-day after they have received two years of very generous returns. To-day they are in better condition than they have enjoyed for years, so far as earnings and credits go.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman not know that it was at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury that some of the best roads did not go into the market and borrow for their own accounts because the Secretary of the Treasury did not want to have the competition of the road bonds with the Liberty bonds?

Mr. CONNALLY. That was very true during the period of the war when Liberty bonds were being sold. However, no such competition will exist after the end of Federal control. Let us hope there may not be necessity for further bond sales. With plenty of money in the country no trouble should be met in marketing meritorious securities—securities backed by real value. No others ought to be marketed.

The Treasury of the United States does not contain $250,000,000 of idle capital with which to make these future loans. The Treasury has not the cash, and if such loans are to be made Government notes must be sold to raise the money with which to make them. The obligations of the Treasury are such that it will need all of its available funds. With the enormous war debt and maturing interest the Government can ill afford new loans. Why can not the lines sell their securities, when it is borne in mind that their rates will be increased and the physical condition of the properties has been vastly improved? The stockholders are usually also the bondholders. During Government control they will have received $1,800,000,000 in returns, a part of which should be available for investment in their own bonds.

VIRTUALLY DESTROYS STATE COMMISSIONS.

Under the present provisions of the pending bill the powers of the railroad commissions of the States to fix and regulate rates on shipments between points in the same State are very seriously impaired, if not totally destroyed.

The State of Texas was a pioneer in the enactment of legislation regulating and controlling railway corporations. It was among the very first States to establish a rate-making railroad commission. At first this policy was savagely assailed as an undue interference with private property and individual initiative, but within a short time its benefits were realized by the public, and to-day the Texas laws governing its railroad commission are firmly established in the affections of the people. Their wisdom has been vindicated and experience has demonstrated that they operate fairly and justly both as to the railroads and the shippers. The people are accustomed to dealing with State commissions. They are nearer to the people and more easy of access than the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington. To cripple the State commissions as this bill does, to strip them of effective powers, is to practically abandon all State control and regulation. Under such regulation the roads grew into the finest system in the world and the States exacted respect for and obedience to their laws. Is it wise, is it necessary, to forsake such a policy?

CONSOLIDATION AND CENTRALIZATION IN WASHINGTON.

Section 407 empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission, on application or its own initiative, "to approve and authorize such unification, consolidation, merger, or pooling," and so forth. This section disregards State laws and constitutions prohibiting the unification of competing or parallel lines. It places in the commission the power, if it should see fit to exercise it, to consolidate all of the railways in the United States into a single great system. The exercise of the power to that extent may not perhaps be anticipated, but to pursue such a policy measurably in any given region or territory would prove hurtful. Even where rates are the same on all roads there has always been a "competition in service" where two or more lines could carry the identical or similar shipments.

This competition consisted in a rivalry in promptness and a contest in courtesy and fair dealing. With one great system, or even regional systems, this element of competition would be very largely, if not entirely, eliminated. During Federal control frequent complaint has been heard that unified operation has resulted in the destruction of such competition and has begotten a degree of disregard for the public convenience.

Under subdivisions 17 to 19 of section 402 lines of railroad are denied the right to build a new line of railroad or an extension without the consent of the commission. This action further gives the commission sweeping power to control the entire car service of all railways, including "the use, control, supply, movement, distribution, exchange, interchange, and return of locomotives, cars, and other vehicles used in the transportation of property and the supply, movement, and operation of trains by any carrier by railroad subject to this act."

This section confers upon the Federal commission absolute and autocratic power to distribute, allocate, and control the movement of all cars and locomotives without consideration of the ownership of such equipment. Localities or sections of the country in times of great need for cars and equipment, such as the harvest season or the cotton season, if their needs are not supplied by the carriers will have no legal recourse against the carriers for failure to supply equipment for the sufficient reason that the carriers may answer that they are not responsible because their cars and equipment were directed to other points or sections by the Interstate Commerce Commission. On shipments of live stock or other perishable freight serious consequences may be suffered by such practices. When cattle are moved to points of shipment they should be transported speedily. Heretofore the carriers have been responsible under their common-law liability, but responsibility may be avoided under the provision referred to. To obtain any character of redress the complainants must apply not to their State railway commission or to the courts but to the commission at Washington. One of the very serious complaints made during Federal control has been lodged against this very practice, by which shippers have been forced to send their complaints to Washington. The section presupposes wonderful "vision" in the commission, if it is to be imagined that it can look out from its offices in Washington and survey the needs of the various sections of the entire country and anticipate their wants more accurately than the traffic officials of the individual lines who make an intensive study of their own sections and their seasonal needs for cars, or than the State railway commissions of the several States.

Section 415 enacts into law the holding in what is known as "The Shreveport case." This clause pretends to recognize the State commissions by directing the Interstate Commerce Commission when examining the relation between intrastate rates and interstate rates to give notice to the State authorities and by authorizing the Federal commission to "confer" with the State commissions. These provisions, however, in nowise limit the authority of the Federal commission, conferred elsewhere in the bill, to override and destroy the powers of the State commissions, but on the other hand emphasize such power in the following quoted language:

> The commission shall have authority, after full hearing, to make such findings and orders as may in its judgment tend to remove any undue advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons or localities in State and interstate or foreign commerce, respectively, or any undue burden upon interstate or foreign commerce, which is hereby forbidden and declared to be unlawful, and such findings or orders shall be observed while in effect by the carriers parties to such proceeding affected thereby, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding.

It will be noted that the clause just cited empowers the commission to pass upon questions arising in "State and interstate and foreign commerce" and ends with the ominous and funereal words "the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding." If other paragraphs of the bill have in anywise failed to pronounce the doom of State railway commissions, the language quoted effectively and completely accomplishes that purpose.

The measure now before the House concenters practically all power and control over rates, routing, equipment, pooling, consolidation, and the multifarious affairs connected with railway traffic over every railway line in the United States in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whether the road be one wholly within a State or an interstate road, whether it be incorporated under State or Federal law. The evils of centralizing in the Federal authority the powers of government at the expense of the States should be apparent to all. The further the agencies of government are removed from the people the less responsive to the popular will those agencies become. As the departments of government become more distant from the people it becomes more difficult for the people, and in this instance for the shippers, to secure access to and a hearing before the Government functionaries for the purpose of redress or petition for the rectification of abuses. To confer limitless authority upon a bureau or commission not directly responsible to the people is often to invite indifference to the rights and appeals of the people.

The exercise from Washington of war-time powers by the various boards and bureaus created for the war emergency, which entailed many fretful annoyances and vexatious inconveniences to the people and to the business of the country, has demonstrated very forcefully the objections which may be justly urged against the extension of such powers in time of peace. My own hope is that emergency restrictions and interference with the accustomed activities and business of the people may be speedily removed and the country be permitted to again resume its normal relations and functions.

CONCLUSION.

The problem of transportation is one of the greatest with which it is our duty to deal. Every pound of freight and every passenger that is carried by railway is necessarily forced to contribute a fare or charge to the transportation lines. Transportation affects every producer that sells his product, every laborer that toils in field or factory, every consumer that purchases any article of commerce not produced in his own locality, every farmer that brings forth from the bosom of nature, with the aid of sun and shower, the plant that feeds or clothes his fellow man. The public pays the freight and foots the bills. The public pays the wages of the railway employees; it pays for the equipment and the cars; it pays for all of the material of steel and stone and timber in the tracks and roadbeds upon which the engines and thundering trains speed from ocean to ocean; and last, but not least, it pays the dividends upon the capital invested in all the railway properties of the Union.

According to my own view, this bill does not accord adequate protection to the interests of the shipping public, and the term "shipping public" embraces the whole people.

In the brief time allotted to me I have undertaken to advert to some of its features which particularly invite my disapproval.

There are those who hope to capitalize the public demand for the immediate return to private management and to thereby secure the enactment of legislation which would be considered impossible in calmer moments. Many Members have expressed their disapproval of many features of the bill but have indicated their intention to support it as the best that can be secured. As for me, my reason and my judgment compel me to register my vote against it. Rather than embrace this measure I should sanction the return of the roads by the President under the laws existent at the time of their taking and now in force. The Commerce Commission has the power and will be ready to receive the petitions of the carriers and grant adequate rates and proper remedies. Congress will consider and enact any fair and needful legislation that conditions may then require. This measure will place upon the farmers, the business men, the shippers, and the consuming public obligations and burdens which in the light of the facts are neither warranted now nor will they be justified by time and experience. If this bill is enacted in its present form, the exactions which it imposes upon the public, when thoroughly understood, will arouse a storm of righteous protest. Let us return the roads, but let us not in doing so place upon the people undue and unfair burdens, which, once imposed, will be difficult to remove. No, gentlemen, I do not approve the bill, and, not approving, I can not without disagreement with my convictions give it my support.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of addressing some questions to the chairman of the committee. Under section 207 the word "carrier" is applied to such railroads as may receive from the Government a certain guaranty, but on line 13 there is an exception made as to interurban electric railways. Why was this exception made?

Mr. ESCH. This exception was made because the same exception was made in the Federal-control act and in this specific language. We had to do it.

Mr. DUNBAR. Electric interurban railroads doing an interstate business are not under the control of State institutions. They are under control partly of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ESCH. If they do an interstate business they are under the commission.

Mr. DUNBAR. The Interstate Commerce Commission has decided it has authority to grant, upon application of the electric railway doing interstate business, an increase in rates. That is, they grant them authority to put into effect increased rates, but the Interstate Commerce Commission has also decided that it has no authority, no jurisdiction, to compel that same electric railway company to furnish adequate passenger accommodations for its patrons. Under this bill where will these passengers get protection?

Mr. ESCH. In a subsequent provision we have taken care of that.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is that under section 402?

Mr. ESCH. I think possibly that is the number. We have given the commission very large powers in regard to ordering common carriers subject to the act to supply themselves with sufficient and safe equipment. Under that provision of law I think that emergency which the gentleman refers to could be met.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the place for me to take that up would be under the amendment to the commerce act?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; under title 4.

Mr. DUNBAR. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, on page 13, line 21, after the word "charges" I move to amend by changing the colon to a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. And on page 17, line 4, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may correct the spelling of the word "certificate."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, after line 23, add the following new paragraphs:

"(g) The contract of June 21, 1918, between the American Railway Express Co. and the Director General of Railroads as amended and continued by agreement dated November 21, 1919, shall remain in full force and effect during the guaranty period so far as the same constitutes a guaranty on the part of the United States to the American Railway Express Co. against an operating deficit: Provided, That such express company shall within 60 days after the termination of Federal control file with the commission schedules embodying general increases in its rates, fares, and charges.

"The commission shall as soon as practicable after the expiration of the guaranty period certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the operating deficit, if any, of the American Railway Express Co. during such period and the amount necessary to make good such guaranty. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed thereupon to draw warrants in favor of such express company upon the Treasury of the United States, which shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the amount shown in such certificate as necessary to make good the guaranty."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in the course of the hearings the status of the American Railway Express was presented and it was shown that the four large express companies were incorporated under the laws of one State, I think of Delaware, with a capital stock of something like $34,000,000 or $35,000,000. The express companies were not taken over under the Federal control during the first six months of the control. At the end of that period some of the companies were not able to pay the Government the amount due the Government for the haulage of the express and the express cars. There existed theretofore a contract whereby the railroad company got about 50 per cent of the gross receipts of each express company, the balance being kept by the express company. Now, at the end of the first six months of Federal control one of these companies could not pay to the Government its ordinary contract agreement of 50 per cent of the gross receipts, so that the Government took stock as compensation in this corporation, and I think another express company made a like adjustment with the Government. So that the Government has invested something like $6,000,000 in the stock of this American Railway Express Corporation. Now, then, they entered into contract with the Government; that is, these four companies entered into a contract with the Government in July, 1918, whereby the Government guaranteed their operating cost. They have not been able to pay such cost up to date, and there has been a small deficit each month, although I understand that deficit is now decreasing with each succeeding month. The amendment I have offered simply gives this company during the guaranty period of six months provided for in the bill the contract agreement which existed during the period of Federal control, namely, that the Government will make good operating deficits.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman state whether this contract which was made between the express companies and the administration was a common-consent contract or was it a forced contract?

Mr. ESCH. Well, I judge from the financial situation at the time it was possibly forced and the consolidation was really made in the public interest in that it tended greatly to decrease the overhead charges, for instead of having four agents and four delivery trucks in a town they would need to have but one.

Mr. SNYDER. But it did succeed in raising rates almost instantly on express?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 13, line 25, strike out the figures "1917" and insert "1916."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, when Congress was considering taking over the railroads I opposed the test period; that is, the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. I am not criticizing my colleagues that that test period was placed in the law, even though I disagreed with them. At that time I called the attention of Congress to the fact that every time you increase freight rates you increase the cost of living. My colleagues did not agree with me, and I have watched with a great deal of interest since then the magician's wand to see how by the increase of freight and passenges rates there could at the same time be a reduction in the high cost of living. But I admit I still do not understand how it can be done. I want to say to this Congress that it is unfair to the people of the country to make the three years mentioned in the bill the test period, and far be it from me to do an injustice to the railroads. I realize they are entitled to certain things, to a reasonable return; but I lay it down as a principle that can not be denied on the floor of this House that it is unfair to take the three years in which the traffic of any corporation was larger than ever in the history of that corporation as a test period.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I will yield.

Mr. HERSEY. Is not the gentleman trying to change the contract of the United States made with the railroads when we took them over?

Mr. SEARS. We made no contract; we simply made that the basis.

Mr. HERSEY. That is our contract with the railroads. Shall we keep it?

Mr. SEARS. Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. HERSEY. I think so myself.

Mr. SEARS. If the Government paid more than it should after they broke down, it would not make it right to do the wrong again. The people of this country, I think, many times do not receive from the hands of their colleagues, who profess to have so much love for them when their ballots are being cast, much protection on the floor of this House when their interests are involved. I say it is unfair to take the three most prosperous years, because you know, and my colleagues know, in 1915, 1916, and 1917 every pound of freight that it was possible to secure was being shipped to the countries across the waters, and that is one of the reasons which brought about the supposed breakdown of the railroads of this country, because they were unable to handle that traffic. When they are turned back to their owners, it may be possible that the freight will fall off. If this should be true, why should we agree to a return based on abnormal conditions. I think it is nothing but equitable and right that we should take a part of the time before the war began and a part of the time after the war began as the basis upon which the return should be guaranteed. I do not believe this can be successfully contradicted, and therefore in the interest of justice that the railroads may not get more than they are entitled to, and that the people may get a reduction in the cost of living and may not be deprived of something they are entitled to I have offered this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has been recognized.

Mr. DENISON. I simply want to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Florida that I think his remarks would have been quite pertinent a couple of years ago when we passed the act.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman does not want to do me an injustice. I have just stated—and the gentleman is a very good friend of mine—that I made the same argument when the bill was up before.

Mr. DENISON. But the gentleman did not vote against the bill on that account. I was one of the men who did vote against the Federal-control act for that very reason, but having adopted that test period and made it a part of the law, I am willing to abide by it, and therefore this bill provides for the same test period.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This would not change the contract, inasmuch as the test period applies to the six months subsequent to Federal control. The test period in the other law covered the return the railroads would have during the operation under Federal control. Now, this provides a new test period governing the six months subsequent to Federal control. Now, it may or may not be made the same as the other——

Mr. DENISON. I will say to the gentleman that this does not really alter the contract, but we are by this law simply extending the guaranty that was provided for under the Federal-control act for an additional period of six months. Now, all of the accounting and bookkeeping and everything else has been based by the administration upon the basis of those three years, and it would be an extremely difficult matter to readjust all those things by selecting another test period.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I appreciate the fact. I thought the gentleman was taking the position that another Member seemed to take in asking a question, that we would be inconsistent in making a test period. It may be impractical, but it would not be inconsistent.

Mr. DENISON. It would not be exactly inconsistent.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield.

Mr. HERSEY. The roads are practically under Government control during the six months mentioned here. It is new legislation.

Mr. DENISON. This bill is doing all that we can do to get them out from under Government control, but we must do all we can to reestablish their credit. The great thing that the railroads will need in the immediate future is credit, and this guaranty provision in the bill is intended largely to reestablish their credit in the markets of the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Maine as to why six months were provided for the guaranty period, it might be said that the Interstate Commerce Commission estimated that it would take six months for them to readjust rates so as to approximate the cost of operations and the residue that the roads were entitled to. That was why the six-months period was fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. As I understand it, the expense of the Government guaranty during these six months will be considerably more than the actual deficit that would have accrued if the Government continued actual operation of the roads during that time by reason of the fact that the roads that make money will not come in under this clause and those which lose money will. Is that right?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then, what will be the gross expense to the Government based on the information you have, provided it is anything like during Government operation? What will be the greatest expense to the Government during those six months, in round numbers?

Mr. ESCH. I do not know as I can give you any estimate from recollection. If some other member of the committee has that information, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. CALDWELL. Do I understand, then, that the committee does not know how much this is going to cost us?

Mr. DENISON. This guaranty?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. No one can possibly get that information, unless he can look into the future and see what the railroad business will be every day.

Mr. CALDWELL. What was the average for six months?

Mr. ESCH. I will say that the total amount of standard return for a year was $936,000,000 for class 1, 2, and 3 roads, and about $895,000,000 for class 1 roads. Now, the amount for the first six calendar months of the year would represent about 43 per cent of the total of the $936,000,000, and the other six months would represent something like 57 per cent, due to the fact that there were, of course, less earnings the first six months than during the last six months.

Mr. CALDWELL. That would be about $360,000,000, provided there was nothing coming in by reason of the profit of certain of the roads. But there were roads making a profit. So that this six months will probably cost somewhere between $800,000,000 and $1,000,000,000?

Mr. ESCH. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. How much, then?

Mr. PARKER. According to the figures of the Secretary of the Treasury, it cost the Government for 18 months approximately $600,000,000. That was operating deficit, and you can figure that for six months and get a fairly decent average.

Mr. CALDWELL. Provided all the roads were to be considered; but some of the roads are making money, and good money, under the joint operation by the Government. Have you made any calculation at all to show approximately what it would cost us here?

Mr. ESCH. As to the making of money, I will state to the gentleman that there were only eight roads in 1918 that earned more than the standard return, and those roads, I think, were almost wholly in the South and have earned more than the amount of standard return by only about $12,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the language as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

The term "test period" means the three years ending June 30, 1916,

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, has the time for debate expired on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida?

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I move, then, to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for the purpose of submitting a few remarks in connection with the position assumed by some of the Members with reference to the three-year test period. While the Government was operating the railroads in war times, there might have been some reason for taking three prosperous years as the basis for the guaranty that was furnished the railways during operation under Federal control.

Therefore the three years prior to June 30, 1917, were taken; that is, for whatever contract the Government had with the railroads for that period. Now, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida we are taking three years as a test period for another guaranty—a new guaranty that is altogether dissociated from the prior guaranty—which previous guaranty was to cover the period of Government control during war time. This new period of guaranty is six months subsequent to the time when the Government is to turn back the railroads.

Now, I am opposed to any guaranty whatever for that subsequent period, and I expect to vote to strike out the entire section relative to it. Why should the public be taxed for this purpose when provision is made for loans? However, if this House is determined to vote them a guaranty, it seems to me we should not do it for that six-months period during which there was no war and during which the Government was not operating the railroads; but if the House is determined, we at least should not select the three fat years as the basis of the guaranty. That is supported further by the fact that during the war period, when we had the three years provided by the present law as the measure of the guaranty, the Government got all the surplus earnings of the roads, which made more than the guaranty, and these surplus earnings went into the Treasury of the United States.

Under the new system of guaranty during the six-months period subsequent to the Government control any railway that makes 25 or 50 per cent on its earnings will be able to keep those earnings and the Government will have no return of the surplus. That seems to be an additional argument as showing that the guaranty should not be the three years prior to June 30, 1917, as well as for striking out the entire section. Therefore it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] should be adopted, and that on final vote the entire section should be eliminated.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Texas and also the gentleman from Florida have talked about the three fat years of 1915, 1916, and 1917. I really would like to have some information, if the gentleman has it, as to how much leaner the preceding three years were. What would be the difference? I presume it would make some difference, but I do not know what it would be.

Mr. JONES of Texas. My only information is that the years prior to the one ending June 30, 1917, were more or less normal, and that the last year, ending June 30, 1917, was the year of great business. Some member of the committee could probably furnish exact information.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. If my colleague went from here to Texas, so far as the passenger traffic was concerned, he would know that there was more travel during those years than for several years before.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 14, line 3, after the word "than," strike out all words down to the word "If," in line 5, and insert the following: "6 per cent net."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the President has notified us officially that he will return the railroads to their owners by the 1st of next January. This notification has been repeated and emphasized several times by the director general, Mr. Hines. Hence it is necessary that appropriate legislation should be enacted in advance of that date to meet the exigencies that will arise at that time.

Of course, we understand that the Federal control act approved March 21, 1918, confers upon the President the discretionary authority to take such action at such time as he may choose. In view of his decision in this matter there is no opportunity left for the consideration of any other course of procedure. Thus the questions of Government ownership and operation of the railroads, the continuance of the roads according to the McAdoo plan for a period of two or five years or for a period of 21 months after the proclamation of peace shall have been issued, are entirely removed. In view of such Executive action, it is useless to consume time now even in the consideration of the bill to perpetuate the McAdoo plan for an additional period of five years. In addition to this, the testimony shows that fully 85 per cent of the people of the United States are opposed to the McAdoo plan and earnestly desire its abandonment as speedily as possible by returning the roads to their owners.

The bill now before us prescribes conditions for the operation of the roads after their return on the 1st of next January to their owners by Executive order. In this connection we should emphasize the fact to the people of the country that the legislation under which the President assumed charge of the roads nearly two years ago does not in any particular convey ownership or title or any portion of the railroad properties to the Government. The ownership was left in the possession of those who held the properties on and prior to the 28th of December, 1917. During this period of Government operation under private ownership we have advanced from our National Treasury $1,250,000,000, nearly one-half of which will be a complete loss to the Government. It is presumed that the roads in time will pay back to the Government between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 of that amount.

It is useless to consume time at present in rehearsing the unfortunate and inexcusable losses that the Government has sustained through its attempt to run the railroads. Some assert that the losses and mismanagement are due to railroad men acting with deliberate purpose to discredit Government operation, and especially Government ownership. Those who make such charges should remember, however, that the directors general, Mr. McAdoo and Mr. Hines, acting under the direction of the President, had full authority to dismiss every person guilty of such misconduct. Hence, it is proper to say that all of that loss and all of the miserable mismanagement are directly chargeable to the directors general, McAdoo and Hines. It is useless, however, to consume any considerable amount of time in rehearsing these mistakes. What does the pending bill propose?

FINANCIAL PROBLEM.

For the present I invite your attention to the question of financing the roads for successful service after the President returns them to their owners on the 1st of next January.

The primary purpose of the roads for which they were originally chartered contemplates good service for the public at reasonable rates. That service should be intelligently measured with respect to its actual cost. Good wages must be paid to the employees of the roads, and safe and sanitary conditions should be supplied to protect the health, life, and comfort of the employees in the discharge of their hazardous tasks. The matter of equipment and upkeep of the properties necessarily involved in the transportation business must be taken into account. In order that capital may be induced to seek investments in transportation enterprises it must find in the value of the properties security for the investments and also satisfactory returns in dividends. These necessary charges must be fairly and equitably measured and distributed in the wise and proper solution of all of these questions. The total cost of such service must be paid by the public in the rates, fares, and charges necessary to establish, maintain, and perpetuate the transportation business of the country.

In former years we have heard much about watered stocks. This bill proposes a stock and bond section in the Interstate Commerce Commission which will guard against such vices in the future. All of the old arbitrary, unjust, and inequitable levies of freight and passenger rates should be wiped out. The Interstate Commerce Commission should be clothed with authority to prevent any one community from sharing in discriminatory rates to the injury of other communities. Discriminations of that character should disappear at once and forever from the transportation business of the country.

In order to secure business stability during this period of reconstruction, this bill provides for the continuance of a guaranty for the period of six months from January 1 to June 30, inclusive, 1920. This provision is made because that length of time will be required for the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the rates that ought to be established to meet the actual running expenses of the roads on this new basis. In addition to this extension of the guaranty, the bill provides for a revolving fund of $250,000,000, out of which loans may be made to the roads that need financial assistance in rehabilitating themselves for the future. Thus the roads will have the aid of the Government for a period of six months within which these complicated questions can be worked out to a satisfactory conclusion without the disturbance of wages of employees and adequate financial returns of the roads to meet the financial demands that will be made upon them for good service to the public. It is earnestly hoped that the expectations of the authors of this bill will be fully realized in these particulars.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the guaranty should be changed in at least one important particular, and I submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 14, line 5, after the period insert:

"Provided, That such guaranteed income shall in no case exceed 6 per cent of the actual outstanding capital stock of the carrier."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, please note the provision in the amendment—"6 per cent net." This would avoid any interference with the payment of the general expenses of the roads and leave the return of a net profit of 6 per cent.

I quote now some figures from a tabulation furnished by the Statistical Bureau of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will be found in Senate Report No. 246, part 2, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session. This tabulation groups the roads under three headings: Eastern, southern, and western districts. For the eastern district the average net payments upon the valuation, as indicated in the report of the commission, were 11.48 per cent; for the southern district, 12.37 per cent; in the western district, 9.96 per cent.

Yesterday, in the debate, I quoted "162 per cent" as the amount paid to a certain road. Some gentlemen laughed as though that were an impossibility. Now, I will give you a chance to laugh again. If you will turn to this report of the Interstate Commerce Commission you will find those figures in connection with the Colorado & Wyoming road. But these are more interesting in connection with the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co.—647.22 per cent paid to this road under the guaranty carried in the first section of the Federal control act.

Further, let me read a few items relative to the big roads.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In a few moments.

Beginning first with the eastern district, 12.96 per cent; I omit titles of the roads in order to save time. Another, 11.92 per cent; 25.7 per cent; 32.9 per cent. Dropping on down to the one mentioned a moment ago, 647.22 per cent. Then dropping down to the southern district I find 11.33 per cent, 16.75 per cent, 13.6 per cent, 14.99 per cent, and 21.67 per cent. Turning now to the western district, I observe 9.7 per cent, 22.5 per cent, and 114.12 per cent.

Gentlemen, here are excessive rates, net guaranties paid to these roads. If they are given a net guaranty of 6 per cent after their individual total running expenses are paid, it will be quite as good as most lines of business in the country will realize.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to make a suggestion. You say "6 per cent net," but you do not say what of. I take it for granted that you mean to put in enough language there to say "6 per cent net on the stocks and bonds of the road."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The phraseology of the bill and these reports will indicate. They are tabulated here side by side, capital stock for the average period indicated in the Federal control act, average income from these various roads, and the average net return percentage. The railways are divided into three districts—eastern, southern, and western. The table, so far as these three items are concerned, is as follows:

Road.	Capital stock actually outstanding (average for the 3 years ended June 30, 1917).	Average net income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.	Average per cent of net income to capital stock.

It will appear from these figures that the average net rate of dividend guaranteed by section 1 of the Federal control act is 11.27. The rate proposed in my amendment would not exceed 6 per cent net. The roads that earn the net dividend of 6 per cent would receive nothing. The roads that are most likely to realize that net gain are the largest roads with the largest average outstanding capital stock. Thus it is evident that my amendment would save to the National Treasury more than one-half the amount that would be paid under the terms of the bill, under which each of the following companies will have for its stockholders dividends at the following rates:

These reports and the wording of the Federal control act and the bill before us interpret my amendment clearly.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, in a spirit of fairness to the public, that we give to each of these roads only a fair rate of net return, and hold the balance for the taxpayers of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] provides for the Government guaranteeing 6 per cent net; "for the guaranteed period as a whole" it "shall not be less than 6 per cent net." Now, 6 per cent net upon what? Is it net on the capital stock of the road, or is it net on the capital stock and bonded indebtedness of the road, or is it net on the commercial value of the road? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Upon the average capital stock, as set out in section 1 of the Federal control act, the terms of this bill, and the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STEVENSON. But this is not definite.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The gentleman asked me a question, and I should like to answer it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I might vote for the gentleman's amendment if he will make it sufficiently definite.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will accept anything that will make it definite.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not quarreling with the gentleman. I am trying to get information to determine what this amendment means.

Now, as to the entire proposition here, it strikes me that it is going rather far for us to ask the people of this country to pay a tax to guarantee anything, when we provide for financing these railroads during the time in which they will have some trouble. There are only three things for which we have a right to appropriate money: To pay the debts of the United States; well, this is no debt. To provide for the common defense; well, the war is over. To promote the general welfare; well, now, as a condition precedent to this guaranty going into effect in favor of any railroad, we require the railroad company to come up and ask for and have its rates increased, so that instead of providing for the general welfare you are providing for an enforced additional tax in the way of rates upon every citizen of this country, and for that reason, if nothing better is offered, I will vote to strike out, in accordance with the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. I think probably we could stand a 6 per cent guaranty on the basis of the net income, as suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska, and to some extent defend that before our constituents, because it would not cost them very much; but when it comes to guaranteeing all deficits and allowing those who make money to take the profits and go with them, it strikes me we will be asking our constituents for a considerable bill of credit when we go to them with an explanation.

Mr. DENISON. Can not the gentleman see that if we substitute 6 per cent it will cost the Government a great deal more than the provisions of the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. I say 6 per cent on something definite. I prefer something definite rather than any indefinite floating guaranty, which may amount to $500,000,000, as has been stated to-day.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest a phraseology that I think will make it clear.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no doubt the gentleman will work that out as I called his attention to it, but the roads go back to the companies with increased rates. It is said that there has been an increase of wages. They would have had to increase the wages if they had continued to operate for themselves. They go back with their facilities certainly unimpaired. They go back with an enormous opportunity to finance themselves, which is presented by a country which has more capital for investment than it ever had before. They go back with the invitation of the Government to ask for a sufficient increase in rates to make them profitable within 12 months. They go back not only with these things, but with our promise that we will loan them the money that is necessary to keep them going until business does become profitable under the new arrangement of rates, and it seems to me it is going too far in addition to that to ask the taxpayers of this country to provide for paying them a gratuity.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to have the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska in the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 14, line 3, after the word "than," strike out all words down to the word "if," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Six per cent net."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to modify the amendment so that it will read—

Six per cent net upon the average capital stock of the company for the test period—

The three years ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the guaranty provision in this bill, and I am going to vote to strike it out unless it is amended in some way so that the guaranty will be definite and less than I think it will be under the provisions as now written. In the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] the amount of the guaranty becomes more indefinite, because he says not less than 6 per cent. Therefore it can be just as much more than 6 per cent as can be obtained by the railroads. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska makes the matter a whole lot worse than it is under the provisions of this bill. If he wants to make it 6 per cent, he ought to strike out the words "not less," so that as a whole it shall be 6 per cent, and make it definite and not indefinite.

However, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that even if his amendment is so modified and adopted, I shall vote to strike out the guaranty section.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ALEXANDER: Page 14, line 5, after word "period," insert the words "provided such average operating income does not exceed 6 per cent."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, unless some limitation is placed in this section, such as suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska or myself, I will vote to strike out this section of the bill, because I do not think that in justice to the taxpayers of the United States we can agree to guarantee to these carriers the same rate of income covered by the test period. So my amendment is to this effect, that we guarantee to the railroads the net income received by them during the six months that they received during the time covered by the test period, provided such net income does not exceed 6 per cent. We ought to be just to the roads, but anything more than that, to my mind, is not justifiable.

Mr. ESCH. Six per cent of what?

Mr. ALEXANDER. On the average operating income of three months. We undertake to make good to them earnings up to the amount earned during the test period covering three years ending June 30, 1917. If their net earnings covering the six months are more than enough to make their net income more than 6 per cent, that the guaranty shall be limited to 6 per cent.

I realize that the amendment may be defective in form, but my purpose is to emphasize the fact that the Congress should not undertake to guarantee to the carriers net income on their property greater than 6 per cent to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, if the roads earn 6 per cent, that ought to satisfy them. If they do not earn 6 per cent on the average capital stock, not on the income, not on some speculative figures, but on the average capital stock as shown by the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon which all payments have been made under the Federal-control act—if we guarantee 6 per cent, that is enough. If they make it, we pay nothing, and if they earn more, they keep what they earn.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman says a return of 6 per cent on the capital stock; does he mean to limit it to that or to other indebtedness?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I mean to limit it, as it is limited in the Federal-control act, and that is the capital stock as ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will yield, many roads in the United States before Federal control did not earn 6 per cent or any per cent. Many under Federal control have not earned 6 per cent and the standard return did not give them 6 per cent. Under the gentleman's amendment all the roads would be guaranteed a minimum of 6 per cent.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. My idea is that we should deal with every road that the Government has taken on the same basis. The bill as we have it to-day is for a six months' period from January 1 to June 30, 1920, on the same basis with all roads, 6 per cent to each road.

Mr. BARKLEY. The result will be that for the next six months we will deal with them much more generously than they have realized heretofore.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Not so far as the net return.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 11, after the word "guarantee," insert "with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the time such excess was paid."

Mr. BLACK. I rise to speak at this time, Mr. Chairman, just to say this in reference to the criticism which has been expressed that the Government has paid a larger amount than was justified as compensation to the railroads under the war control act.

Let us see about that. Ten years ago the amount that the railroads earned, including the dividends to stockholders and payments made to their security holders, was, in round figures, $760,000,000. That was 10 years ago. Since that time there has been an additional investment made in railroads and terminal facilities of at least $4,000,000,000. I think that that will be admitted by anyone who has studied the statistics on the subject. Thus we have in the 10-year period an increase of only the difference between $760,000,000 and something over $900,000,000 annual rental or standard return which the Government has paid to the railroads during the period of Federal control. This difference represents all the increase in their earnings, or about $150,000,000, notwithstanding that there has been an increase of about $4,000,000,000 in their capital investment.

Now, as to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] respecting the amount of the increased cost of operating railroads, I am as far from being an advocate of Government ownership as any man in this House, but we ought to be fair to the Railroad Administration in considering the facts connected with the operation. What are the facts? The largest factor of this increased cost in operation is due to the increased wages granted to the railroad employees. Has that increase been larger than that which has been paid to other labor which is comparable to railroad labor? Recently we had come to our offices a report prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which shows the increases in wages of several employments that have taken place since 1913, and while this goes back further than the period of Federal control, yet it is illuminating in considering this subject. It shows that during the period of time which elapsed since 1913 the increase in the wages of steel laborers has been 121 per cent; cotton industry, 79 per cent; silk industry, 91 per cent; woolen industry, 93 per cent; clothing industry, 71 per cent; boot and shoe industry, 47 per cent; and other increases of a similar nature which I might mention.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that more than 47 per cent of the operating expenses of the railroads go to the wage earners?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I am.

I think it is a good deal larger than that now. Something over 60 per cent, I believe. Now, what has been the increase, since the Government took control, in the wages of railroad employees? Mr. Hines, in his testimony before the Committee on Appropriations at the time the $750,000,000 appropriation bill was under consideration, gave this testimony: He said that the increase to all of the employees, ranging from the lowest paid up to the highest, and differing in amounts, averaged about 51 per cent to 52 per cent, and he called the attention of the committee further to this fact, that included in that 51 to 52 per cent was pay for overtime, and that, when a proper deduction was made for that, it would be somewhat less than 51 to 52 per cent.

Therefore I submit that the increase that the Railroad Administration has given to the railroad employees has not been any larger, speaking as a general proposition, than that which has been given to other labor in other similar industries. Of course, there may be some exceptions as to some particular class of employees, but I am speaking of the proposition as a whole.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How does the increase in the transportation charges and freight charges compare with the rise in other directions?

Mr. BLACK. They have not been nearly so much. I do not think it is fair to say that the railroads, that the security holders, the stockholders, and the employees have been paid an unreasonable amount, because the facts I have shown establish that it is much less than has been paid to some other industries, and therefore I do not think that the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is based upon a sound foundation.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say that at all. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] said that.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What is the highest dividend paid to any road under this award?

Mr. BLACK. Six per cent.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I saw a table which showed 162; 5 per cent was passed, and then 6, and then 7, and they were voted down.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it will average 6 per cent, but I think I should modify the answer that I first gave the gentleman. In a very few cases I believe it has exceeded 6 per cent, but the average dividend is much less, considerably less, than 6 per cent.

Upon the question as to the fairness and reasonableness of the standard return which the Government has paid the railroads, I presume that Mr. William G. McAdoo would be about as unbiased a witness as could be called. Mr. McAdoo stated before the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in 1918 on this point as follows:

> I am particularly convinced that it is fair and reasonable in view of the optional character of the possession and control. Moreover, a just basis promptly provided and accepted will aid the Government incalculably in carrying on successfully the stupendous financial undertakings essential and, in fact, vital to the success of the war. That, in general, is the principle which I have felt should animate us in dealing with this very vital problem. I do not attempt to state the figures with accuracy, although I could do so by referring to memoranda, but I may say that in a general way the net income of the railroads, the character of net income we are dealing with here, was something like a billion and thirty-five million dollars in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917. Upon the basis of guaranty proposed, the Government commits itself to a guaranty out of the revenues of the railroads of about $935,000,000. Am I right about that?
> Senator KELLOGG. That is about right.
> Secretary MCADOO. In other words, we are taking the railroads over under a guaranty of about $100,000,000 less than they earned in the last fiscal year of the period, and in addition to that excess-profits taxes are to be paid out of that guaranteed income. If the Government, with its powers of coordination and common use of facilities, with the probable economies that may be practiced under its control of the situation and with an advantage of $100,000,000 over the proposed guaranty as shown by the earnings of the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, has not made a fair trade upon the merits of the proposition for a temporary use of these properties, then I am frank to say I do not know what would be fair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We may as well understand exactly the effect of section 207 on the business of America. Do not let us fool ourselves at all. This section means but one thing. It is an open invitation to the railroads to apply for a raise of rates and an indirect order to the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant such increase. There is and there can be no question about that, because in lines 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, on page 13, having set up how a carrier can participate in a guaranty, it adds that it can not participate in this Government subsidy unless it has asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to raise the rates. Therefore section 207 does this, and nothing but this: It creates a fund from the Public Treasury and invites the carriers to participate in the fund, but makes it a condition precedent to the participation that they must apply for an increase of rates. It is quite simple.

Remember, now, that in extending this Federal-control guaranty for six months you have added this additional burden upon the taxpayers of the country by taking out of that participation every rich road that makes more than the guaranty or more than the standard returns. Whatever that may be, they put it in their pockets, and your guaranty extends simply and solely to those roads that do not make the standard return. Under the operation of the Federal-control act we paid out last year $936,000,000, and that was when we were getting what the good roads made and paying out what the bad roads lost. No one knows under this provision how much we will be called upon to pay out, because we release every good road and keep only the poor ones. Then you have placed the business interests of the country in this position, where you have invited the roads to come in and participate in the public fund, provided they put this additional burden of rates upon the shipper and the consumer, and you have said indirectly to the Interstate Commerce Commission that which this Congress would never undertake to say directly. You will never undertake to say to the Interstate Commerce Commission directly, "You must raise the rates." By this section you undertake to say indirectly to the commission, "You must raise the rates upon the shippers and the consumers of this land." High finance!

Every speech that has been made upon this point this evening convinces me more and more that the only safety to the public, who use these roads, the only way to leave the Interstate Commerce Commission free to fix the rates, taking into consideration the justness and reasonableness thereof, will be to cut section 207 bodily out of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "guaranty," on page 17, in line 11, down to the end of the page.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 11, after the word "guaranty," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, I suggest that an amendment was adopted at that point and the gentleman's amendment should come after the last word of the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to that. I wish to strike out all after the amendment which was just adopted. I desire in this connection to ask the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce what the purpose of the language which I seek to strike out is?

Mr. ESCH. It is to prevent their securing the guaranty without having filed application for an increase in rates. We felt that if we gave them the guaranty they might say, "We will not apply for any increase in the rates until the very end of the six months' period; we are all right; we are going to get the guaranty, anyway." That would necessarily involve an expenditure upon the part of the Government in that it would not get, through the carriers, enough of income so as to meet the standard return. We felt that we should have some form of assurance to the Government that the rates would be increased to meet the standard return, or the guaranty, and that the Government would not have to sustain the loss, as it has done during Federal control: that under the guaranty the carriers, through an increase of rates for which they would apply, would get enough revenue to meet and possibly more than meet the guaranty.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad, indeed, to have the viewpoint of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], to which I do not agree. I think it would be very unfortunate for the Congress to go to the country with a statement in the law returning the railroads to their owners, that we expect the railroads at once, upon coming into possession of their property, to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask for an increase of rates, saying to the railroad companies and to the country that unless they do ask for an increase of rates, which we virtually guarantee to grant by this provision of the bill, they can not receive any portion of the revenue under the guaranty which we make in connection with the standard return. I am not willing to serve notice upon the people of the United States through this law or any other that we are starting out to increase the freight and passenger rates that are already higher, in my judgment, than they ought to be. It will not do for this committee to say that they fear the owners and operators of the roads would not exercise the diligence necessary to earn the guaranty and standard return during the six months' period.

It will not do for this committee to say we are inviting these railroad managers to sit back in swivel chairs and not undertake diligently to pursue the task that is imposed upon them. I have more faith in the wisdom of these men than to believe that they will be indolent. I believe they will be unusually diligent when the roads come back into their possession. I believe that they will try to the best of their ability to prove their ability and earn for the roads what they should earn.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask for three or four additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that he have three or four additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. These railroad managers are on trial or will be on trial when the roads come back into their possession, and they will be compelled by public sentiment, if by no other pressure, to prove that they are doing everything in their power to meet the obligations, interest and otherwise, out of the earnings of the roads without coming back to the Treasury of the United States. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois know anything about what part of the standard return the railroads as a whole have been earning? My information is that in New England they had only been earning a very small proportion of the standard return.

Mr. MADDEN. According to the report of the committee recommending the passage of this bill, the railroad companies of the United States have lost during the two-year period about $600,000,000. That is what they say. Now, I maintain that if $900,000,000 be the aggregate loss under Government management, it is fair to suppose that when the roads are turned back to their owners and they are managed as a business proposition that this $600,000,000 loss will fade away, and under present rates and present wages the railroads will not only earn what is equivalent to the standard return but they will not be compelled to ask for higher rates, and an invitation such as this bill carries to ask for higher rates the very moment they take possession is an injustice to the American people which I do not propose to submit to but to the best of my ability resist.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to direct the gentleman's attention also to the fact that if one road, for instance the Baltimore & Ohio, applies under this provision and asks for an increase in rate and it was granted because of its impecunious condition, every road in competition with it would have an increase also whether they were running behind or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly. And I think it very unwise to say the least that this great committee, patriotic as it is, should come to the House with a recommendation in advance, or rather an invitation in advance, to the railroads to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase in rates.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. Was I correct in understanding the gentleman to reply to a gentleman on the other side of the aisle that the effect of the application for a rate would be the establishment of such a rate per se?

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all. I said if it were granted, but my judgment of what we should do is this: We should turn the roads over to their owners with the six months' guaranty with present rates understood to be in effect and present wages, and then let the managers of the road exercise the genius which I believe they possess to produce results. Let them work, get down on their marrow bones hunting up business, and introduce such economies as can be introduced into the management of the roads, and not under any circumstances be invited to come to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase of a rate before making any attempt to prove their ability to run the roads efficiently. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the great fear that has been expressed by the public generally who are informed upon these matters, and by the witnesses who testified before the committee, was that the credit of the railroads is in such a condition that they will go to pieces upon being returned unless the Government in some way protects them during this transition period. Now, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, who has just taken his seat, said that when we turn these railroads back they will be upon trial, and he never said anything truer than that in his life; not only that but they will be on trial for their lives. There has been no one who came before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and gave evidence in the consideration of this bill who did not express a belief that with the increases of wages that have been put upon the railroads during the period of Government control, and with the apparent necessity for increase hereafter, and with the increase in the cost of materials that the railroads have to have, it will be impossible for the railroads to meet their operating expenses on the present level of freight rates. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I think we may as well not try to fool ourselves or the country. We may as well face the situation and recognize the fact that there is going to be a readjustment period in this country, and in my judgment there must be an increase in freight rates.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. No; I have not the time. The railroads will need credit. We realized that, and as one means of securing credit for the railroads the committee provided in the bill that they should have this guaranty of the standard return for an additional period of six months. Now, having decided to grant them the guaranty because they have to reestablish their credit, we were not willing simply to let them have the benefit of the guaranty and take no measures to prepare themselves for the time after the guaranty period expires or to make their revenues sufficient to give to them their standard return. We are trying to prevent all the loss to the Government that we can, and that is the meaning and the purpose of this provision in the bill. We want to rehabilitate the railroads in so far as it can be done by the action of Congress. We realize fully the public necessity for adequate transportation service. Without that there can never be any real prosperity in the country, and without credit the railroads can not furnish the people adequate transportation service or facilities. So the committee has endeavored to go as far as we reasonably could to reestablish railroad credit. But in doing so we could not, of course, neglect the interests of the Government. We tried by the provisions of the bill to protect the Treasury as far as possible.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I expect to support the committee in the main in their position on this bill. That is my duty, and in this case my inclination. I shall try to resolve every doubt I have in regard to the provisions of the bill in favor of the view of the committee. But we have reached a provision in the bill that I think of tremendous importance, a provision relative to which I hope the committee may modify its view after further consideration. We are proposing to return the railroads of the country to their owners—to their management and control. We would not be justified in doing that in the manner proposed if we did not anticipate better, more efficient, and more economical management under such control and management than under public control, management, and operation. If the owners of the roads can not operate them more economically and more efficiently in the public interest than the Government can, then we should listen to the arguments of the gentlemen who favor Government ownership and operation. I am one of those who believe that the men who own these roads, the men who built them, the men that have operated them, can operate them more efficiently and more economically than the Government has or the Government can. If I did not believe that, I would not be in favor of this legislation. And I take it that that is the view of all of us. And yet we are starting out in this transfer of control with a provision that in effect serves notice on all the people of the United States that they may anticipate and expect an increase in the cost of transportation under private control.

We are proposing to compel the carrier in this portion of the section which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out to file a request for increased rates before he can become the beneficiary of the Government's guaranty. The guaranty may be essential and necessary to stabilize the operation of the roads and afford them the necessary credit at the beginning of the new operation under private management. I think the guaranty may be essential, but I do not think it ought to be coupled with a notice to all the world that we expect, in the payment of that guaranty and during the period during which we pay it, people will be called upon and obligated to pay higher freight rates and passenger rates than they are paying now or have paid during the period of the war and under Government management.

Now, it may be true that the owners and the private operators may not be able the first six months to overcome the handicap which will confront and surround them, and so operate their properties as to meet the standard return which we guarantee. But, whether that shall be true or not, we certainly are not justified in saying to the people of the country we will vote to compel these carriers to ask for higher rates, and expect the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant them, and it is our opinion that in this transfer from Government control, that has been so unsatisfactory, to private control, you will have to pay more money for your transportation than you have paid heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Inasmuch as we propose to loan the railroads any and all money they may need during that six months' transition period, which will not be a gift, and then when times get good and normal they will make the money and pay the Government, is not that better than to loan or give it to them in any shape, form, or fashion?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the guaranty fund may be necessary and essential. I am inclined to think, as I said a moment ago, that a guaranty for six months will be helpful and may be essential, although there may be ground for difference of opinion in regard to that matter. But assuming that we should guarantee the standard return, should we couple with the notice to the operators that we do not expect them to be able to operate their roads in a way to pay the standard return a notice to the public that we expect they shall pay more for railway transportation under private than under public operation?

Mr. SIMS. Is not the guaranty itself a statement that they are going to need more than they are going to get out of it?

Mr. MONDELL. Not necessarily, because the guaranty, in my opinion, is more in the nature of an insurance. The roads will start under private control under conditions that are far from satisfactory. The guaranty will steady the operation, will improve and strengthen the credit of the roads, will give them confidence, and will afford them a better opportunity than they otherwise would have to get on their feet. But let us not publish the suggestion that we expect the people to pay a larger sum than they have been paying; that we do not expect the carriers will be able to improve conditions or to bring about economy or to operate the roads in a more satisfactory way than the Government has done.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Does not the gentleman from Wyoming believe that this guaranty will aid materially in carrying further the subject of reasonable wages for employees of the roads?

Mr. MONDELL. It will strengthen and sustain the roads in their operations and better enable them to fulfill their obligations of all kinds and sorts than they would otherwise be able to do. But let us not make the mistake in doing that of serving notice on the roads that we expect to pay more than we have paid heretofore for the services they render.

And the gentleman from North Carolina made a very pertinent suggestion in this connection. What if it should fall out that some road somewhere failed to meet its standard return; do we intend to give the Interstate Commerce Commission permission to invite it to raise the rate on that line alone in order that by so doing it shall meet the standard return? And, if not, are the rates all over the Union to be raised high enough to enable one "weak sister" to pay her standard return? What is the answer? What is the proposition? How much of an increase is intended, or expected, or proposed, or justified under that kind of a provision?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. The answer to the question is that the Interstate Commerce Commission would consider that application just as it considers all other applications and adjust it under the rules of rate making that it has.

Mr. MONDELL. This compulsory demand by congressional action must have some special meaning and purpose. Otherwise it is to no purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. If it means anything, it is notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission to take action relative to rates in order to meet the situation. Does it mean that the rate shall be raised on some one road to meet the difference between the earnings and standard return? Or does it mean that the rate shall be raised everywhere sufficiently to meet that condition somewhere? Or does it mean that they shall endeavor to make a general advance in rates that will meet the sum of all of the deficiencies? Why, one gets into a perfect maze of speculation when he begins to inquire as to what the purpose may be. The proper thing to do is to grant the guaranty and not invite or suggest an advance in rates. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. DEWALT and Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, let us be entirely clear in this matter as to what this provision actually means with reference to the filing of these schedules of rates.

First, to whom does it apply? It certainly would not apply to those who did not desire to avail themselves of the guaranty. In other words, the roads that were making more than the stipulated amount of the guaranty would not apply for the guaranty, and therefore they would not be obliged to file the rates. That is true, is it not?

In the second place, if it applies to those who do not earn as much as the guaranty, which are those roads? Those are the weaker roads. Now, the reason for putting in this provision, according to the mind of the committee, was just this—and, answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], let me say this: When this application is made for the increase of rates it is made only by those roads which apply for the guaranty. It does not apply generally to the whole rate-making system of the country and all the roads.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the committee anticipate that, with the provision of the guaranty in the bill, practically all of the roads will apply for the guaranty?

Mr. DEWALT. No, sir. We anticipate just the contrary. For instance, the Northern Pacific would earn very much more than the guaranty of the test period, and it does earn very much more.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. If there were only one or two railroads here and there——

Mr. DEWALT. There were eight different roads, as I understand, which earned more than the standard return.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman have the Interstate Commerce Commission raise the rates of those roads above the average level of others under like conditions in order to meet the situation of those roads? And if so, how about the rule of uniformity?

Mr. DEWALT. All of those roads have been operating under Federal control under the standard return. Now, it is farcical to say that any road that earns more than the guaranty provided in this bill would apply for the guaranty, because it would not be in accordance with good business methods to do so. They would be losing money by it. Therefore it resolves itself again into what I have tried to say, namely, that the roads that do apply for the guaranty are those roads that do not earn an amount equivalent to what would be afforded by the guaranty. The committee did not want these roads that did not earn the amount to "lie down on the job," as the saying is. In other words, if they are not compelled to file this application for a raise of rates, they go on for six months and they get their guaranty. There is no doubt about that. But if they wait until the last minute of the expiration of the guaranty period, then possibly they are going to file their rates, and possibly not, and the accumulation of the business before the Interstate Commerce Commission will be monumental and they will never get through with it during the period of six months.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. DEWALT. I will yield to my colleague from Kentucky first.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would that be an incentive to the road filing its schedule in the last minute making application to the Interstate Commerce Commission not to suspend the rate for six months but to put it into effect immediately?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. Now I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is the gentleman's theory that only here and there an inconsequential road shall make this application for the guaranty, why place in this bill a provision to take care of a trifling and unimportant situation here and there throughout the country?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think it is trifling, nor do I think that there are but few roads that will avail themselves of this provision. I think there are a number of them.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. DEWALT. I think there were only 18 roads in this country that earned more than the standard return.

Mr. ESCH. Eight.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not altogether probable that all except those 18 will apply for the guaranty?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. May I be permitted, Mr. Chairman, one moment more to answer a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. If they do, then there is all the greater necessity that the burden and the obligation be placed upon them to make this application for rates, so that they do not "lie down on the job," and the Interstate Commerce Commission can investigate and fix the rates.

Mr. BRIGGS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I think the argument brought out over this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] emphasizes not only the danger of that portion of the section to which the amendment is addressed and which is sought to be stricken out, but also presents the danger to the people of this country of adopting any part of this whole section.

The anxiety among the people of America to-day to have the railroads restored to private ownership is to be relieved of the great losses entailed and experienced in the operation of those roads by the Government. It is because the people of this country are tired of Government operation and Government ownership, or what has been equivalent to it by the control of the railroads by the Government during the war period, and yet this provision of the bill not only does not relieve the people of any of those burdens, but it seeks to impose upon the people for six months longer burdens which even the committee can not estimate, but which, perhaps, from the amount of the standard return of $900,000,000 a year, and the 43 per cent of that for the first six months, would leave the people to pay under this guaranty at least a quarter of a billion dollars.

Now, why is this provision put in here, requiring the railroads to come forward in 60 days with applications for increases of rates, or otherwise to be denied the provisions of the guaranty?

The committee feel that that proposition is a highly dangerous one, that it will destroy initiative, efficiency, and incentive on the part of the roads under private operation to do their best to reduce expenses and give the people the best service at the lowest cost. That is the only reason why it is put in there, as the chairman, I think, announced in his remarks in general debate. I want to say that I am not only in favor of striking it out, but of striking out the whole section, just as we struck out section 205 and substituted the Denison amendment. I say that this whole section is unwise, and it fastens upon the people, not any relief from Government operation, not any relief from the burden and expense attendant upon it, but it shackles the public for six months longer, and ought not to be allowed to remain in this bill. Every safeguard is given the railroads to get means to continue their operation. The present rates in effect are allowed to continue. Even under the Denison amendment they are allowed a most liberal time to pay a large share of their indebtedness, approximately $250,000,000, which they owe the Government, and which is permitted to run over a period of 10 years.

Another provision of this bill, section 208, provides for an appropriation of $250,000,000 to be used as loans to the railroads during the next two years to tide them over the difficulties that they will experience in financing their operations during the transition period, and I say that is sufficent to enable the railroads to operate, and is as much as they can fairly expect from this Congress or from the people of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is one of which we should take careful consideration at this time. I believe that the people of the United States are interested in railroad rates, because they necessarily affect all questions concerning the high cost of living. Everything that people eat, wear, or use in any way has to some extent to pay the railroad rates. In other words, this is to furnish the funds. Now, if Congress guarantees to these railroads the amount of money contained in this bill or suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska, it seems to me that we have gone to the extent that we should go in strengthening them for carrying on their operations. If under private management railroads can not be conducted and freight rates lowered, then there is no argument for returning these roads to private ownership, and the people might as well know it. If, on the other hand, the private owners can operate these roads so as to lower the freight rates of this country, they should be given that opportunity, and now is the time to do it. To say here that for 60 days they shall have a right to file these applications is, it seems to me, a vain thing. What can they possibly know in 60 days? It is only a surmise that is to be put up to the Interstate Commerce Commission. There can be nothing definite about it, and consequently, as stated by the gentleman from Wyoming, it seems to me that all railroads, looking into the future and thinking of drought and pestilence and everything of that kind, will believe that the safe thing to do is to make application for increased rates, and then make some kind of a showing before the Interstate Commerce Commission, possibly not supported by facts which will be borne out by the future, and thus get an increase of rates. If the railroads should happen to follow that policy, the result would be that the whole people of this country will have brought to their attention the convincing fact that private management can not equal, let alone excel, the management of Government ownership. So it seems to me that no direction should be given in the law itself holding out to the railroads an invitation within 60 days to make this application for an increase, thus unsettling the business conditions of this country; because an application by all of the railroads for increased freight rates during the next 60 or 90 days would in my opinion be a blow at the reconstruction of business in this country. So why invite it? Why ask them to do it, and ask them to present only the facts that have become available to them within 60 days? It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out paragraph (f).

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, if adopted, will not accomplish the purpose its author professes to entertain. The amendment which the gentleman proposes on page 17, line 11, applies only to paragraph (f). Paragraph (f) refers only to those railway corporations which may ask for an advance of the guaranteed return. On page 13, line 17, is the clause which requires every railway corporation, before it can obtain the return, to make application for an advance in rate.

Mr. MADDEN. If this amendment of mine is adopted, I intend to offer an amendment to that provision of the section to which the gentleman is calling attention.

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment, which the Chair says is not in order, is to strike out the entire paragraph (f), because it will not only accomplish the same purpose that the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will accomplish, but it will prevent these companies obtaining an advance of the standard return.

I do not desire to tire the committee with my observations, but a little while ago some gentlemen were not here who are here now. I do not believe that we can justify a vote for a subsidy to finance the railways during the first six months of private control. Gentlemen on the floor of this House make the assertion that the credit of the railways is in a bad condition. That, my friends, is not a justification for granting the railways a subsidy. Even if that condition existed, my limited information on this subject leads me to say that I believe the railways are to-day in less need of credit than they have been in a number of years, because during the period of Government control their properties have been improved by the Government, and the Government by the terms of this bill proposes to finance them to the extent of a quarter of a billion dollars in loans. But the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] states that he believes a temporary guaranty for six months is necessary in order to stabilize the railways.

My friends, if this Congress proposes to use the funds of the Government to stabilize financial institutions which may be in bad condition it is undertaking a course and policy for which it will not be long in finding cause for regret. If the rates have to be raised in order to bring in a fair return to the railways, let the Interstate Commerce Commission raise the rates. I for one propose to protect with all my strength against the establishment of this policy of a subsidy. So far as I know this Government has never subsidized any industry, except the wheat industry. It subsidized the wheat of the farmers because it wanted to increase their efforts to produce wheat for war purposes and war necessities, and guaranteed the railways a fixed rental because it took the railways from the owners and was required to pay a fair return. But I do not believe we can justify voting for this subsidy. As has been observed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS] a moment ago, if we surrender the railways—and I am in favor of returning them; I am not in favor of Government ownership—but if we are to subsidize the railways we offer them no added stimulation toward economy of operation if they know they are going to get the subsidy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not in five minutes reply to the two-pronged attitude which this thing has assumed. I think it is easy to understand why the guaranty of the United States is offered. I am as much opposed to a subsidy to railroads as anybody in this House. There is no reason, personal or political, why I should favor such a subsidy.

But here is the situation, and we might as well confront it like intelligent men. When the railroads are turned back to the owners, the difference between the income and outgo will be very much larger than what it was when the Government took over the roads. Whether that has been brought about by the Government control or not, it has certainly been brought about during Government control. If the Interstate Commerce Commission were equipped on the first day after the roads were turned back to readjust the scale of rates sufficient to meet expenses, there would be no reason for the guaranty. That is why we have provided for a guaranty—because the commission testified before us, and various State commissions did the same, that it would require six months for them to readjust the rates, because they are given two months to file the scale of rates and then four months to put them into operation, after suitable investigation.

In order to bridge over the six months and to meet the necessities of the roads, we have provided that they shall receive the guaranty on the average return for the corresponding six months during the test period of three years prior to June 30, 1917.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Also you provide that unless they make the application within a certain period they can not get it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am coming to that. On the face of it, at first blush, it struck me, as it does the gentleman from Illinois and others, that it was an invitation to the railroads to file schedules of increase. However, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is adopted, the result will be that all the roads will get the guaranty, whether they need it or not and whether they file any schedule for readjustment of rates or not, and the result would be that many of them would get it when they will not need it and when they will not need an increase of rates.

The fact that they do file a schedule for increased rates does not mean that it will be given to them. That is a matter for the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and settle during the six months' period.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The particular paragraph which the gentleman seeks to strike out limits instead of broadens the section.

Mr. BARKLEY. It certainly is a limitation. If the amendment is adopted, any road can make application for a guaranty and get it without making application for sufficient rates as would make it unnecessary for the Government to have to pay out any guaranty. Any road might say, "I am on easy street; I will get the guaranty—I will lay down and compel them to guarantee me this amount—and at the end of the six months' period I will file an application for increase of rates"; and by reason of the fact of any chasm or gap between the increase of rates and the increase of expenditures already existing it might make application to the Interstate Commerce Commission that that increase of rates should go into effect immediately, without being suspended, and give them an opportunity to investigate the reasonableness and justice of the rates. Therefore, as an earnest of good faith, we required that they should file their application for increase within the time required as an evidence of the fact that they need the guaranty.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, in paragraph (d) the United States Government guarantees to each carrier that its railway operating income for the guaranty period shall equal its income for the test period. If the other amendment should be adopted which, we are told, is to follow this one, then the operating income would be guaranteed to all railroads now under Federal control.

Paragraph (e) provides that that payment shall be made at the end of the six months' period:

(e) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall, as soon as practicable after the expiration of the guaranty period, certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the railway operating income of the several carriers during such period, and the several amounts necessary to make good the guaranty to each.

And so forth.

Paragraph (f) covers an entirely different situation. If a railroad can not at any time during this six months' period meet its operating expenses, it may apply for this advance. Not for the guaranty itself but for an advance payment of the guaranty.

Before it can get payment in advance it must first file application for an increase of its rates. This has nothing to do with the payment of the guaranty. It has to do only with the time at which the guaranty shall be paid. If it can not operate for six months, if it can not wait for six months until the regular time of payment, it may apply for an advance payment, but before the Interstate Commerce Commission can make that advance payment it must first pass on the question as to whether there should be an increase of rates. It seems to me that it would be a mistake to strike out that requirement.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I read in a newspaper the other day that a certain person named Hays, who occupies the position of chairman of the Republican national committee, had made a statement in which he said that the Republican Party intended in the railroad bill to take care of the interests of the railroads, and, of course, this railroad bill does——

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that the gentleman from New York must proceed in order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, well; I would be surprised if the Republicans do not want to know what Mr. Hays says. This is a pro forma amendment, and I will proceed in order. There is some effort here, according to the debate on that side of the House, to take care of the employees of the railroads, but I have not heard anybody point out anywhere in any manner how this bill takes care of the public. Whether or not it is taking care of the public is fully demonstrated by that great barometer which the Republicans have for the past generation pointed to every time they wanted to know what the country thinks of legislation—the stock market. We notice a break in the New York Stock Exchange only yesterday of 68 points on some industrial stocks, showing that the people of this country realize that this bill does not take care of the interests of the people, of the producers, of the manufacturer, and this section of the bill ought to be stricken out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How long is it since the Democratic Party turned to Wall Street stock quotations to test public sentiment? [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, it is always nice to look at the standard set up by your opponent when you get ready to ask the question whether or not your opponent is really sincere and honest in his declaration.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not having had an answer, I repeat the question. How long since the Democratic Party turned to the Wall Street stock quotations as a test of real public sentiment and opinion?

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman knows that I have not said that the Democratic Party looks to that. My remark was that the Republican Party had always pointed to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we eschew politics and get back to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the discussion here reminds me of the story of a lawyer whose services were sought for the purpose of instituting suit. He told his client that he would take the case on a contingent basis. The client asked him what that meant. The lawyer replied, "If I lose the case I get nothing, and if I win you get nothing."

I think that is the situation of the public in so far as this particular section of the bill is concerned. It is claimed by the committee that the reason it wants to require the road which desires the guaranty to file a schedule of rates is to keep it from "laying down" on the Government. I submit that if you are going to furnish every railroad a guaranty, you will make it to the interest of all who accept that guaranty—if their argument is legitimate—to "lay down" on the Government, and at the same time file their application for an increase in rates. Then, regardless of whether any effort is made to earn anything, but, on the contrary, by making the opposite showing, they can get their guaranty and at the same time get their increase of rates. A subsequent section of the bill provides the method for taking care during this transition period of those roads that can not make their way. This subsequent section provides that the Government will make them loans if it is necessary in order to help them over that transition period. By making a loan to the various roads and making them operate on their own merits without a guaranty—or, in other words, stand on their own bottom—they will have every inducement to make their expenses as low as possible and their income as high as possible, and at the same time they can file their schedule for an increase of rates, if such increase of rates is necessary.

They can make their showing just the same as they would make it if the guaranty were furnished them. It seems to me that a railway should be required to make a showing at least before any money is furnished it. I for one am not in favor of adopting the policy of appropriating money simply to stabilize any industry, as has been expressed by some one who preceded me. This section of the bill not only provides a guaranty, but also almost orders all the railway companies to ask for an increase in rates. It provides that they must file an application for an increase in rates before they can get the guaranty. It is almost like authorizing a conspiracy to raid the Treasury. Where does the public come in on such a proposition?

There is another thing I would like to call to the attention of the committee. It has been argued here that some of these roads will not need the guaranty provision and, therefore, will not apply for it. Others will need it and apply for it. The big railways of this country have a method, when they want to use it, of diverting traffic. The roads that are able to make their income and more will have the traffic diverted over their branches, and they can make a lot of money, while the other roads will not need to scramble for traffic, for they will simply say they are going to get their money in the form of a guaranty anyway. Thus the great roads can have certain branch roads sit supinely by and do nothing during the six months guaranty period, while the great roads, with traffic diverted their way, grow prosperous and keep the surplus.

While we are returning the roads to the owners I am not in favor of neglecting the public interest. We owe some duty to the Treasury of the United States and to the public which pays the bills.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If we strike out the part of the section proposed to be stricken out by the Madden amendment, will it not really be in the interest of the railroads?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am inclined to think so. Therefore we should adopt the Sims amendment, which strikes out the entire section. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the entire section. That is the amendment to which I am speaking. I do not care particularly what is done with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, but I rather think that if the section were going to be left in it would be well to defeat the Madden amendment. That, however, is an amendment of relatively unimportant consideration. I want to remove all question by eliminating the entire paragraph. In other words, I do not believe we should guarantee the railroads a net income after the Government releases them and they are returned to the private owners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment now pending, and the gentleman's amendment can be offered after this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then I withdraw it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out certain language.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH) there were—ayes 38, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 16, line 10, strike out the words "certified to the Secretary of the Treasury" and insert in lieu thereof "submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to Congress."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Did I understand the Chair to state that time had been fixed and that I can not speak on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the section and all amendments thereto was closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended three minutes in order that I may explain this amendment, as I believe the chairman may accept it if I can explain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that notwithstanding the previous order of the committee the time may be extended three minutes in order that he may speak to his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it may be necessary to reply to the gentleman if he says anything during those three minutes——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I think the time had better be made six minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. As the gentleman always says something worth hearing whenever he speaks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks that the time of six minutes may be allotted on his amendment, and that he may have three minutes in which to explain the amendment, notwithstanding the previous order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under the bill as it now reads we give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to draw a sight draft on the Treasury for the amount that shall be ascertained by them to be the compensation due. Under the amendment I have offered the amount of compensation due the railroads would be estimated to Congress, and Congress would appropriate the money, as it has always done. I doubt seriously whether the Congress has the right by such general language as is contained in this section to appropriate an unlimited and indefinite amount. We have passed a budget bill, by which you say you are going to make your revenues accord with your appropriations. But here you make an indefinite appropriation which no Congress can ever ascertain. You will never know how much you have paid or will have to pay under it. Under the amendment I have offered the estimate will come to Congress. It can not be argued that it will mean great delay. Your pensions are estimated for by the Pension Bureau, and the appropriation is passed by Congress, just as every other appropriation should be passed by Congress. The language as it stands requires no estimate; simply on the certificate of the Interstate Commerce Commission the Secretary of the Treasury pays it out, and the Congress will never be able to ascertain how much is to be paid. There is no express appropriation of any amount, as is required by statute.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought not to be adopted, in my opinion. In the first place, the amount these roads will be entitled to will be fixed. We fixed it by this act—that is, the average amount during the corresponding six months of the three years ending June 30, 1917—so it is not a matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury or in the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the amount. All the Interstate Commerce Commission does is to arrive at the amount which we say they should be entitled to and certify that to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I would hardly be able to yield in three minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I did not use all of my time, and the gentleman can have half a minute. Pensions are fixed by law, but they are required to be estimated for to the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that; but we pass a pension appropriation bill every year. Now, beginning at the end of the six months' period that these railroads will be entitled to the standard return, Congress may not be in session and may not meet until December, and there may be three or four months when Congress is not in session, and the roads would need the amount due, and they would have to wait until Congress is in session——

Mr. ESCH. And even if Congress was in session there might be delay.

Mr. BARKLEY. There might be delay, because it would have to come in the form of a deficiency bill, or something of that sort, and hence we fix here the amount they are entitled to and only authorize the commission to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount that we say here they are entitled to, and without any delay——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does not the gentleman know that Congress has the right through the Appropriations Committee to examine to see whether or not it is correct and——

Mr. BARKLEY. With all due respect, in reply I will say I do not think Congress or the gentleman's committee is as well qualified to ascertain what this standard return is as the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am willing to stand by their recommendation and certificate.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is an appropriation carried in this bill, or provided for elsewhere, for that amount?

Mr. BARKLEY. The unexpended amounts heretofore appropriated by Congress in connection with the Railway Administration are continued in this bill.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The presentation of this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury for the issuance of a warrant would have no force unless at that time there was a definite appropriation by Congress to pay that bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska: Page 14, line 5, after the period insert: "Provided, That such guaranteed income shall in no case exceed 6 per cent of the actual outstanding capital stock of the carrier."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. The subject embodied in it has already been acted on.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. ESCH. All debate on the section has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order against the amendment on the ground that the same subject and provision has been voted on by the committee.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. On that point I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska which provided that the guaranteed income should not exceed 6 per cent, but that came with the motion to strike out a part of the paragraph which provided that the guaranteed income should be the standard income for the six months. This amendment is an entirely different one. The standard income might be much less than 6 per cent and it might be much more than 6 per cent. This is a limitation put after the words in the paragraph down to the period on line 5, and simply says that they may have the standard income for the six months provided it shall not exceed 6 per cent. And it seems to me it is a very different amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the previous amendment, and it provides to strike out certain language and provides that the guaranty should be 6 per cent of the capital stock. The amendment offered is that the guaranty shall not exceed 6 per cent, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOWELL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SIMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 99.

Mr. BEE. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. DENISON and Mr. SIMS took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF NEEDS OF WATER TRANSPORTATION.

SEC. 211. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, through the Chief of Engineers, with the object of promoting, encouraging, and developing water transportation facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, to investigate the appropriate types of boats suitable for different classes of waterways; to investigate the subject of water terminals, both for water traffic and for through traffic by water and rail, including the necessary docks, warehouses, apparatus, equipment, and appliances in connection therewith, and also railroad spurs and switches connecting with such terminals, with a view to devising the types most appropriate for different locations, and for the more expeditious and economical transfer or interchange of passengers or property between carriers by water and carriers by rail; to advise with communities, cities, and towns regarding the appropriate location of such terminals, and to cooperate with them in the preparation of plans for suitable terminal facilities; to investigate the existing status of water transportation upon the different waterways of the country, with a view to determining whether such waterways are being utilized to the extent of their capacity, and to what extent they are meeting the demands of traffic, and whether the water carriers utilizing such waterways are interchanging traffic with the railroads; and to investigate any other matter that may tend to promote and encourage water transportation. It shall also be the province and duty of the Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to compile, publish, and supply, from time to time, such useful statistics, data, and information concerning transportation by water as may be of value to the commercial interests of the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference report on the bill (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park, in the State of Utah.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida reserves a point of order on the section. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] is recognized.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I can not see any use for this section. Here we are creating a new commission to make a report on matters that belong to the waterways of the country. This should properly come under the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and be taken up by the Shipping Board or the Department of Commerce. We are asking here for the Secretary of War to tell you something about ships. I do not know what the Secretary of War should know in regard to ships. And you are also asking him to tell you something about the utilization of harbors and ports. Now, our committee has given a very great deal of time to investigating port utilities, and it is our intention to bring about a bill which will not only make reports but will use the reports that have been made in a proper manner. I do not think this section belongs in this bill at all, and I think that if the gentlemen will just look over the number of different things that the engineers are to report upon, they will find that it does not belong to the War Department or to the Corps of Engineers. I trust the gentlemen will vote to eliminate this section, and I expect that early in December the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries will bring in a bill that will cover both the status of port utilities and the utilization of the information to the advantage of the merchant marine of the country.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is it not true that the Emergency Fleet Corporation has already been conducting exhaustive inquiries into port facilities, terminals, and docks, and all that sort of thing, not only in this country but in Europe?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is absolutely true.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And this would be a duplication of work which is already under way under the Shipping Board's authority?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; a complete duplication of work; and it seems to me it would be a complete waste of time and money. I think the gentleman will realize that the question of ports and facilities is a very important one in building up the merchant marine, and if it is intended to enact a lot of "buckshot legislation" in regard to the merchant marine, you might as well give up trying to build it up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask if in the gentleman's opinion section 211 would apply to the investigation of the Panama Canal navigation?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think it would apply to everything in this country and in foreign countries. It does not seem to be limited to anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is very broad.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; it is very broad. It is not limited to this country.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I suggest that line 9 indicates that it is in connection with the commerce of the United States, foreign and domestic.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; foreign and domestic both.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] will have the very careful and thoughtful consideration of this committee. If you will observe the provisions of section 211, you will see that it undertakes to confer upon the Secretary of War, through the Chief of Engineers, very unusual and extraordinary powers to be carried out by that department of the Government.

As has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the months that have intervened since the convening of this session of Congress have undertaken very exhaustive examinations of this entire subject of our water transportation and our ocean-borne commerce, especially in connection with our inland waterways and rivers, and one of the main features of that investigation, one of the main thoughts that the committee has had in mind in connection with the activities and recommendations of the Shipping Board—which has the legitimate exercise of this jurisdiction in accordance with the purposes for which it was created—one of the recommendations that they have been insisting upon is the investigation and report upon these very specific things that are here sought to the conferred upon the Secretary of War.

If you will refer, gentlemen of the committee, to the original shipping act, the act of 1916, you will see that in sections 18 and 19 the Shipping Board, by that act creating them, were clothed with the authority and the duty of making recommendations and investigations with reference to these water routes and of terminal facilities and arrangements as affected by water and inland transportation.

And yet here by this section you are undertaking to strip the Shipping Board of its legitimate authority, not only from the standpoint of the statute, but, gentlemen, also from the standpoint of the real purposes of its creation and the activities in which it has been engaged, and confer them upon the Secretary of War, who already is overburdened with duties now conferred upon him by law and by statute. And, gentlemen, if you are really and truly interested in the development of the merchant marine of this country, as affected by the possibilities afforded by cheap water transportation, through the shipment of our goods and produce through bills of lading from the point of origin to the seaboard and on to our foreign markets, you ought to favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] and leave the exercise of this function where it legitimately belongs, to the Shipping Board, which was created for the purpose and clothed with the power and authority of investigating these questions, as they have been doing it, and building up to the highest maximum of usefulness the natural facilities which have been bestowed upon the people of our country by virtue of water transportation as it has been improved up to to-day.

Why should the Secretary of War, I ask you, gentlemen, by virtue of the general organization of his executive department, have conferred upon him the powers here sought to be conferred by this section—the power and the duty of investigating the nature of water transportation, of terminal facilities and port facilities, and wharves and docks, and things of that sort—which do not belong, as a matter of conclusion and fair reckoning, within the legitimate powers of the Secretary of War, but do, on the contrary, legitimately belong to the Shipping Board, which this Congress has created, with this as the very purposes of its creation, in the exercise of their jurisdiction?

I do not think it would be any affront to the distinguished Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to consider this amendment from the aspect I have suggested.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In a moment. I realize it is almost an impossible thing to get in here an amendment against the advice and recommendation of a great committee like the one whose bill we are now considering. But, gentlemen, I appeal to you on this proposition, as a matter of careful and serious importance in the direction of building up our merchant marine and our water-transportation facilities, to give serious consideration to this amendment upon its merits.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to suggest to the gentleman that this provision does not in terms seek to repeal the existing authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER rose.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will be recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a matter of more than ordinary importance. We ought to determine whether or not we are going to vest different bureaus of the Government with power to do the same thing. We have created a Shipping Board, and the purpose is to build up and develop our American merchant marine, and port facilities are necessary to the development and efficiency of operation of an American merchant marine. I can not understand why the authority should be vested in the Secretary of War to make these investigations. The subject is commercial, not military, and it should be under the supervision of a department of the Government that is charged with the development of our water-borne commerce.

Now, the shipping act, in section 17, paragraph 2, provides—referring to carriers by water in foreign commerce:

> Every such carrier and every other person subject to this act shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable regulations and practices relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, storing, or delivering of property. Whenever the board finds that any such regulation or practice is unjust or unreasonable it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable regulation or practice.

Now, the phrase "any other person" used in the paragraph just read is defined in section 1 of the shipping act, as follows:

> The term "other person subject to this act" means any person not included in the term "common carrier by water," carrying on the business of forwarding or furnishing wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water.

It will be noted, first, that the person subject to the act is required to establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable regulations and practices relating to or connected with wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water; and, second, that the Shipping Board, if it finds such regulations or practices unjust or unreasonable, may by order enforce reasonable regulations and practices.

If the Shipping Board is charged with the duty of regulating port facilities, does it not logically follow that the Shipping Board should be charged with the duty of making the investigations set out in section 211 of the pending bill, rather than the War Department? Section 12 of the shipping act provides that the Shipping Board shall make certain investigations, all relating to the development of our American merchant marine. Why should the investigations covered by section 211 of the pending bill be added to and made part of the duties of the board? The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is now considering the question with that end in view.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman read that part of the law which gives the Shipping Board jurisdiction over inland waterways?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They have no jurisdiction over our inland waterways.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I thought.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is very true, but this bill gives the Secretary of War jurisdiction to make these investigations not alone on our inland waterways but on our coasts and the Great Lakes as well. There is no limitation in the section. Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, has been the chairman of a commission on port facilities, created by the Shipping Board, charged with the duty of making a thorough investigation of all questions covered by section 211, and no doubt the Shipping Board will place the results of such investigations before the Congress at the proper time, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has the whole subject matter under consideration now, with a view of presenting to the Congress a bill enlarging the powers of the Shipping Board so that they may have full and complete jurisdiction of this subject matter.

I can not understand why there should be this duplication of service. One great trouble now in our departments is the duplication of investigations by different commissions or boards or bureaus of the Government, resulting in very great cost and expense. But, as I have said, this is a commercial proposition, not a military proposition. The Chief of Engineers and experts from other departments of the Government could be used, as is now being done by the Shipping Board, on the commission referred to. It should be under the jurisdiction of that department, created for the purpose of developing our waterway transportation, and, to my mind, it should belong to the Shipping Board. In any event it should not be in the War Department. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries took up this investigation in reference to port facilities in July last. In that investigation we learned that the Shipping Board had been at work on the question of port facilities for about a year and a half; that they had met with the officers of the Army and the Navy; and that the Shipping Board and other departments of the Government had agreed on a commission under direction of the Shipping Board, with Maj. Gen. William M. Black as chairman, with Admiral Rousseau as vice chairman, with Mr. Rosseter, who is connected with the Shipping Board, together with some six other experts in shipping and port matters. No one of the commission is paid a salary because of the work on this board. They have worked for more than a year and a half. Nearly every port along the Atlantic coast of the United States and nearly every port along the Pacific coast has already been surveyed. They know the depth of the water and the facilities of every port, the docks, the bunker facilities, and the like. They know what should be shipped to particular ports and what can be taken from them. They have made a very careful survey and are having the results of it published now. Not only that, but they have gone to foreign ports to find out just what facilities there are there, what depth of water is, what size of boats can enter, and what is called for in the various ports.

Mr. DENISON. The objection which the gentleman from New York has to this provision of the bill is that there would be a conflict of authority?

Mr. ROWE. Exactly; yes. This new commission would be going over the same work again.

Mr. DENISON. Now, if we should limit the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War in this bill to the inland waterways, would that obviate the gentleman's objection?

Mr. ROWE. No; because a good many of the inland waterways are already under the Shipping Board, everything to tidewater, and the Great Lakes.

Mr. DENISON. But those are not inland waterways.

Mr. ROWE. Yes; the Great Lakes are, and they are now under the Shipping Board, and the whole thing should be left to them.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is it not true that in connection with this investigation and as a necessary part of it this commission has inquired into the facilities on inland water and the possibilities of inland water development?

Mr. DENISON. If they have done that, they have exceeded their authority.

Mr. ROWE. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. ROWE. They are the only board in the United States qualified to do the work. Why should we go ahead and hire other engineers? Gen. Black is very capable on that. He has done this harbor work for the Army. That is the reason he was selected as chairman of this commission.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It has been suggested here by some of the members of the present Interstate Commerce Committee that the reason for referring this to the War Department was because they have an engineering force which covers the country. What does the gentleman say as to that?

Mr. ROWE. Gen. Black is the head of that engineering force.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; but he is connected with the War Department as the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ROWE. But the Army has to do with the ports. That part is all right. That is the development of port facilities, and we have no objection to that. I believe in time, though, that the department the gentleman speaks of, which was established long before the Shipping Board, will be turned over to the Shipping Board, very much as the President asked for this commission to be appointed under the Shipping Board.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, on line 9, page 21, after the word "developing," I move to insert the word "inland," and after the word "water" insert the word "way," so as to read "developing inland waterway transportation."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 21, line 9, after the word "developing," insert the word "inland," and after the word "water" insert the word "way."

Mr. ESCH. Also, in line 12, after the word "of," I move to insert the word "such," so that it will read "for different classes of such waterways."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 21, line 12, after the word "of," insert the word "such."

Mr. ESCH. Also, in line 13, after the word "for," I move to insert the word "inland," and after the word "water" insert the word "way," so that it will read "both for inland waterway traffic and for."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 21, line 13, after the word "for," where it occurs the first time in the line, insert the word "inland," and after the word "water" insert the word "way."

Mr. ESCH. Also, in line 25, after the word "different," insert the word "inland."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 21, line 25, after the word "different," insert the word "inland."

Mr. ESCH. Also, on page 22, line 11, strike out the words "by water" and insert in lieu thereof the words "on inland waterways."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 11, after the word "transportation," strike out the words "by water" and insert the words "on inland waterways."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Does the gentleman want to make any change in line 7, page 22?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I move to insert the word "inland" before the word "water," line 7, page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 7, before the word "water," insert the word "inland."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does inland waterways include the Great Lakes?

Mr. ESCH. The Great Lakes are under the jurisdiction of the Shipping Board by the Shipping Board act.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. SMALL. Would it be the purpose of the gentleman to exclude the Great Lakes and harbors; in other words, what does the gentleman have in mind by the expression "inland waterways"?

Mr. ESCH. The exclusion of the coast terminals.

Mr. SMALL. Would your language also exclude the Great Lakes?

Mr. ESCH. I think it would. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we can rightfully give this jurisdiction to the Secretary of War through the Engineer Department, because of the large experience members of the Engineer Corps have had with the peculiar inland water transportation of the United States. No other body of the Government has control of inland water transportation. They get it because they are the body that sees that navigation is maintained on the inland waterways, and the Engineers have developed that navigation. In connection with that work they have more or less experience in handling ships, vessels, and boats, and, above all that, they have the experience in the development of the types of tows and barges for inland water transportation. The Shipping Board has no knowledge of such matters and the Emergency Fleet Corporation has no knowledge of such matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that before the vote is taken there is a reservation of a point of order to be disposed of.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida withdraws his reservation of a point of order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments of the gentleman from Wisconsin are pending and must be disposed of.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMALL: Page 22, lines 7 and 8, after the word "the," in line 7, strike out "the Secretary of War" and insert "Secretary of Commerce"; in line 8 strike out the words "Chief of Engineers" and insert "Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], I think upon reflection he will conclude that the term "inland waterways" includes the Great Lakes; in other words, it does not exclude them. I think on further reflection he will decide that he does not wish to exclude the Great Lakes from the benefits to accrue from this investigation.

Mr. ESCH. I do not.

Mr. SMALL. So it will only exclude the harbors of the country, and that is what the gentleman had in mind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the House for one moment about this particular section. Personally I have been of the opinion for some years that there should be some Federal agency authorized to make investigations of the problems connected with water transportation; some agency that would collect data, that would have experts in the problems of water transportation in its different aspects. I believe that such an agency would go very far toward promoting water transportation.

Several weeks ago a number of gentlemen met in Washington from the Atlantic seaboard, principally from the Mississippi Valley, with several Senators and Representatives, to consider some amendments to be offered to this railroad bill, and among the amendments the idea of creating this Federal agency found unanimous favor. One of the questions which arose was where should the agency be located? We considered the Shipping Board, the War Department, and the Department of Commerce. After very careful consideration and conversation with the Secretary of Commerce and others of his department, I think one of the volunteer committee conferred with the chairman of the Shipping Board; it was decided that the better place for it was in the Department of Commerce. And in order not to create a new bureau, it was considered that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was the best bureau in which to place this authorization.

May I call your attention to the organic act creating the Department of Commerce. In section 3 it says "it shall be the province of said department to foster, promote, and develop, and so forth, transportation facilities of the United States."

In section 8 of the act creating the department it says that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—it was then both in one department—shall annually make a report in writing to Congress, and so forth, and among other topics says "transportation facilities of the United States, and make such recommendations as he shall deem necessary for the effective performance of the duties and purposes of the department."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. What has the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce done under that organic act in the way of promoting transportation, outside of publishing some annual statistics?

Mr. SMALL. Until the Federal-control act was passed there was maintained in the Department of Commerce one or two men who investigated waterway problems—I recall Mr. Parker, of New Orleans, who was a very competent man—but in the aggregate they have done very little. In that respect I think that department has not been clothed with the responsibilities and duties originally intended. The merits of this section which the committee has included in the bill, however, are independent of the other question of where authority shall be lodged, and my main purpose in rising——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. My main purpose in rising was to ask the committee to give careful consideration to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out this section, which is one of the important sections of the bill for the promotion of water transportation in coordination with rail transportation. Its importance is too great to consider for a moment striking it out. It ought to remain, and if the duties imposed here are properly executed it will demonstrate its great usefulness in the promotion of water transportation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on page 22 there should be further changes.

Mr. SMALL. Yes; if this amendment is adopted, other verbal changes will be necessary. As to whether these duties shall be lodged with the War Department, the Department of Commerce, or the Shipping Board is a matter for the careful consideration of the committee. While the Chief of Engineers and the Corps of Engineers, under the War Department, have given consideration to some of the questions here, the matter of terminals, for instance, and while the distinguished Chief of Engineers, Gen. Black, who is about to retire, is particularly well equipped with knowledge of some of the problems of water transportation, it remains true, as a rule, that engineers are trained in engineering, and are admirably fitted to discharge the functions of engineers in connection with river and harbor works, but neither their training nor their experience equips them with knowledge in respect to the problems of transportation either by rail or by water. As between the War Department and the Shipping Board, I should think the Shipping Board is preferable. As among all, I think the Department of Commerce, owing to the duties imposed on that department when it was created, due to the fact that it has a bureau which can easily discharge the duties imposed here, the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce, is the best agency to execute this authorization.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak very briefly on this. I think it would be a mistake to strike the paragraph out. I think the investigation will be well worth whatever it costs, but I do not think that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] ought to be agreed to. The Secretary of War, through the Chief of Engineers, is the governmental agency which is now very much the best equipped for this work. The fact is that the engineers are engaged and have been for many years very largely in this particular kind of work. Some six or eight years ago we appropriated half a million dollars, or some large sum——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are the engineers equipped at all to investigate the appropriate types of boats suitable to different classes of water? Do their duties lead them to the acquisition of that knowledge?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I think they particularly do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think they particularly do not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Because gentlemen entertain different views on great public questions is the reason why we occupy so much time here in discussion.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Just let me answer this question first. A few years ago we appropriated several hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of investigation of the best types of boats for commercial purposes on the inland waters of the United States, and the duty in making that investigation was confided to the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. I just want to throw a little bit of light from a practical standpoint.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Would the gentleman mind illuminating the subject in his own time, as I have only a few minutes? The engineers of the Army set to work to make that investigation. They were sent to all of the countries of the world. They made a very extensive study of that particular subject. On the Mississippi River and on the Warrior River there have been turned over for their management barge lines which the Government is constructing and which it is to operate.

Now the engineers are charged with the duty of preparing the channels properly to operate the boats on the river. They have already devoted much time and made some very interesting and illuminating reports on the types of boats best suited for those rivers. That has already been done by the engineers, and in addition to that they have been charged with all the varied activities of steamboat operations. The investigation of the insurance feature was conducted by the engineers of the Army, and upon which they made a most elaborate investigation and a most informing report. Everything contemplated in this particular act has heretofore been embraced in the activities of the Engineer Corps, and I do not believe that we can create a more efficient body of men in any department of the Government than the Engineer Corps of the Army. For that reason it occurs to me that the committee has acted wisely in conferring upon them the duty of operating the barge lines and also of making investigations, which they can make and which they can make intelligently by virtue of their experience in operating those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out this section or substitute the Shipping Board for the Board of Engineers, it has already been explained that under the act creating the Shipping Board jurisdiction was only conferred on it to operate or to supervise the operation of ocean steamships and perhaps some on the Great Lakes. They have never had any jurisdiction over inland waterways. They have no bureau or division which is now equipped to make the investigation which is set out in this section with reference to inland waterways, because the transportation conditions existing on inland waterways and in ocean traffic are entirely different, so that expert knowledge on ocean transportation does not necessarily qualify the Shipping Board to pass upon questions that involve inland transportation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is true the shipping board act does not give any jurisdiction at all to the Shipping Board to make such investigations as are contemplated in this section, and that while they have jurisdiction to supervise certain operations on the Great Lakes and coastwise, they have no jurisdiction to explore facts as defined in this section and to make such report as this section provides shall be made.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is correct in stating that the Shipping Board has no jurisdiction to make investigations such as are set out in this section, so that if jurisdiction is conferred upon the Shipping Board it will be necessary for them to create a corps of experts in order to go out over the country and make these investigations and report. Now——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sorry but I have only five minutes. Now, the same is true of the Department of Commerce or the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce has agents scattered all over the world making investigations into the commercial conditions existing in foreign countries, with a view of facilitating our foreign commerce and to some extent our domestic commerce. But there is no employee in the Department of Commerce and there is no agent in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce who is now equipped or authorized or qualified to make these expert technical investigations which are provided for in this section. Now, what is the situation in the War Department? The Corps of Engineers on all our navigable rivers are now in charge of the Secretary of War, and under him there is a corps of engineers who are familiar with the conditions on all the rivers and canals of the country. They know the needs of every terminal of every city along those rivers and in the last river and harbor bill we provided a clause that authorized and instructed the Secretary of War through the Chief of Engineers to make this very investigation as to terminals, docks, and the needs of the various cities along the rivers, and make a report to the Congress so that we might wisely appropriate money for the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

Now, these engineers are already engaged in that kind of work. They are out in the field.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for two additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARKLEY. These men are already in the field. They are out on the rivers of the country. They are already making these investigations. Now, I think if you will read this section and find out what it is we are investigating, you will find that we do not confer upon the War Department any power to act. We merely authorize them to gather this information as to the conditions of traffic, the commerce on the inland waterways, and make it public in such a way as may be necessary, and, if necessary, report to Congress. And they already do that every year. We are familiar with the annual report of the Chief of Engineers. As to the type of boats, as to the cost between rail and water transportation, certainly there is no other body of men now in existence in the Government departments so well equipped as the Corps of Engineers to do this work. There is no other body in any line equally qualified, and I can not understand why it is necessary to duplicate the work that has always been done by the Engineer Corps of the War Department by the creation of another body or bureau to do that work that the engineers are now engaged in. Therefore I hope the amendments will be defeated and the provision will be permitted to remain as it is in the bill. I do not mean the amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], which merely perfect the language of the bill. They ought to be adopted.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

For years we have been expending vast sums of money in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country. We have devoted very little time to ascertaining what business we can procure for traffic along those waterways. It is a recognized fact that the waterways are far more reasonable for traffic than are the railroads. And the congestion during the late war has shown us the great necessity of developing waterways in times of peace.

Now, just whether or not this ought to rest with the Shipping Board, or whether it ought to go to the Department of Commerce, or whether it ought to remain as it is in the bill and with the Engineers of the War Department, is a question which ought to be considered and determined at this time permanently. There ought not to be any duplication of work. And while speaking on that subject, I might note to the chairman that there is no limitation to this investigation and there is no limitation to the amount of money to be expended on it. It may continue for the next 10 or 20 years. It may cost vast sums of money. There is nothing in the bill to show us when we shall get results or what the expense will be. But it does seem to me we ought to have some amendment by which we will get some early results from this investigation. We ought to know something about what this investigation is going to cost us.

Now, the chairman of the committee in amending this section has excluded, as I understand, by that amendment the port terminals of the country, and if those port terminals are excluded, it seems to me that very far removes all the objection of the Shipping Board, which is engaged in the merchant marine of the country, because the Shipping Board are not particularly interested, as I take it, in the inland waterways. What they are interested in are the port facilities of the country, where they do business from one side of the country to the other.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that if you strike that section out, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries will produce a bill that will meet your views very nicely.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not see why the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries should not produce a bill and cover the things highly essential for them to cover, but I do not know why the War Department should not seek this information for the assistance of the railroads, because it is in connection with the railroads that the inland waterways are engaged in traffic.

In the city of Baltimore, since we divorced the railroads from the boats, our business has gone down tremendously. The Merchants & Miners' Transportation Co., which enjoyed a vast trade with the North and South and with the New England States when having traffic arrangements with the railroads, has been divested of a large part of its business. It was not only an injury to the steamship company but it was an injury to all of the consumers along the coast, who were getting their freight cheap.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent for two additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Now, I quite agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who says that the War Department engineers have a vast amount of this information already. If any of you go and ask for an appropriation for your part of the country, you will find in their report not alone how much business you did, the depth of your chanpels, but the number of your elevators, the storage capacity, and the entire business that you do in your city, all set forth in the Report of the Chief of Engineers. And so I feel they ought not to be prohibited from doing this work. But, at the same time, I think the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries ought to bring in a bill to show just what ought to be done with reference to port facilities, so that that business may be encouraged and a great merchant marine built up.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I really do that for the purpose of making a very important announcement to the House. I recently picked up in the Chamber a very considerable sum of money, which I hold in my hand. I would be very glad to return it to any Member who can establish to my satisfaction his title to it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], which, without objection, will be considered as one amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] desire to offer the amendment which he had under consideration?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 21, lines 7 and 8, after the word "the," in line 7, strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "Secretary of Commerce." In line 8 strike out the words "Chief of Engineers" and insert "Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee, a question. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to say, in answer to the inquiry of some one on this side, that the inland waterways do not include the Great Lakes. Is that the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. ESCH. "Inland waterways" would not include the Great Lakes, jurisdiction over which is given to the Shipping Board by the act creating the Shipping Board.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would the gentleman then have any objection to this amendment, at the end of line 12, to add a paragraph as follows: "The words 'inland waterways' used in this section shall not be construed to include the Great Lakes"? That simply clears it up. I suggest that amendment. There ought not to be any doubt about it.

Mr. ESCH. I will be able to answer when the amendment is reported.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think "inland waterways" has been construed to include the Great Lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: Page 22, at the end of line 12, add a new paragraph, as follows:
"The words 'inland waterways' in this section shall not be construed to include the Great Lakes."

Mr. ESCH. I have no objection to that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment. Add the words "or the New York State canals."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLEARY to the amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: After the word "Lakes," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the words "or the New York State canals."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make this brief statement: It seems to me that the whole country is interested in the further development of water transportation on the Great Lakes. They now have the greatest commerce of any like inland waters in all the world. If as the result of this investigation there can be ascertained any facts or information, or if recommendations can be submitted for an increase or greater development of the commerce upon these inland seas, it seems to me that they ought to have the benefit of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. At present even the Shipping Board has no jurisdiction to make that investigation. Can there be any objection to the War Department making it?

Mr. SMALL. There should not be the slightest. The objection of the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which my friend from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is a distinguished member, is not predicated upon any present jurisdiction of the Shipping Board, but upon what is said to be a prospective bill that is to be brought in to increase their jurisdiction.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMALL. In a moment. So that it does seem to me that these inland lakes, with their present great commerce, should have the benefit of this investigation and the recommendations which are to follow from the authority which is herein given.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I wish to state to the gentleman that the Shipping Board is expressly charged under the terms of the act with the obligation of investigating all questions relating to shipping on the high seas and Great Lakes. The term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a carrier engaged in transportation by water of freight and passengers on the high seas and the Great Lakes, and this bill invests them with the duty of investigating the question of navigation on the high seas and Great Lakes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman will admit that the jurisdiction is general, and whatever jurisdiction may have been given has been honored in its breach rather than in its exercise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it would be unwise to put anything in this bill that would take the Great Lakes out of the jurisdiction of the War Department or the Corps of Engineers, or that would restrict them in their activities in making investigations as to the Great Lakes.

As the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] says, the commerce on the Great Lakes is very large. They are the greatest waterways in the world. The waterway between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, on which the Soo locks are located, carries more commerce than does any other port in the world. In volume the commerce is larger and the value is greater than at any other port in the world. The Government has spent many millions of dollars there in magnificent improvements, and it seems to me the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War and the Corps of Engineers should continue as to new construction and for investigational work of all kinds. They should recommend the facilities for commerce and the kind of ships best suited for the business to be done. Second only to the Soo Canal is the Detroit River in the amount and value of its commerce. Statistics show that these are the two greatest waterways in the world. They have been under the jurisdiction of the War Department; improvements have been designed, constructed, and maintained by that department. Its jurisdiction ought not to be changed or restricted in any manner or respect.

Mr. CANNON. Or duplicated.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Nor should any of the work be duplicated. All along the shores of the Great Lakes there are harbors. I have a district that fronts on Lake Michigan for more than 150 miles, with a dozen harbors, most of them under the direction of the War Department. I have had considerable experience with the gentlemen who compose the Corps of Engineers, and I can testify to their splendid character and ability. I doubt if there could be organized in this Government any other force so efficient and reliable. I can not speak too highly of the character of these men. We are safe in imposing responsibility and difficult duties upon them. We can be sure the work will be faithfully and honestly done. I should not like to see any other organization created that will interfere with them or that will provide for the duplication of the work that they have been doing. It is now proposed to divide the work and divide the responsibility, imposing some of the duties upon the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce. I am opposed to the change. The Corps of Engineers have constructed the harbors, built the locks, dredged the rivers, determined the necessary depth, and have drawn the harbor lines. All these things have been done in keeping with and with reference to the size and character of the ships. They make suggestions as to the character of the ships that are to be used, in keeping with the character of the improvements. So their duty is a double one, in relation to the character of the improvements and the character of the ships that are to use the improvements; so it seems to me that jurisdiction over the entire matter, including both these subjects, construction and investigation, should be left with the Corps of Engineers, just where it always has been and where this bill as drawn proposes to leave it. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] seems to be opposed to this amendment on the ground that if it is defeated, the jurisdiction to make these investigations will be left in the War Department. But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that the chairman of the committee has stated that even without this amendment the Secretary of War and his engineers would be excluded from this jurisdiction. The amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] have already, according to his own interpretation, excluded the jurisdiction of the War Department and its engineers from the Great Lakes, and the only purpose of the gentleman from Missouri in offering this amendment was to make it perfectly clear that the purpose which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] had in mind in his amendments should be effectuated by the pending amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee [Mr. ESCH], simply inserts the word "inland"—inland waterways. Now, the Great Lakes are included in the inland waterways of this country.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the gentleman from Missouri before offering his amendment, asked the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] if in his opinion the Great Lakes were not excluded by the amendments already offered, and he stated that they were.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then, in order to make the situation perfectly clear the gentleman from Missouri asked the gentleman from Wisconsin if he would have any objection to the adoption of the amendment which he proposed to offer. Upon his reply in the negative this amendment was submitted. We ought not to leave this situation in a sort of twilight atmosphere.

If we are in accord with the gentleman from Wisconsin that the Great Lakes are considered to be excluded under the language already used, we ought not to object to adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. That action would put the situation beyond any question of doubt.

Mr. Chairman, it is not good legislation to leave the authority of any department in doubt. If already, in our judgment we have adopted an amendment which excludes this particular locality from the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War and the engineers of that department, then if we defeat this amendment we will cast doubt upon the meaning of the language already in the section. It will not be well to do this for very obvious reasons. We did something of this sort with respect to our action looking to the turning over by the War Department of certain surplus material for road construction.

In the first instance we used language that made it clear that this material was to be turned over. Later in the sundry civil bill a section was inserted that by a strained construction was capable of being construed as qualifying the authority given in the first instance, just as in this instance to reject this amendment might be considered as meaning that the House did not intend by the language first used to exclude the Great Lakes.

The attention of the House was called to the fact that one section of the sundry civil bill might possibly be construed to affect the language that we had used in the post office act. This contention was denied, and it was insisted that the language of the sundry civil bill would not affect the provisions of the post office act. But gentlemen know perfectly well that thereafter, on the assumption that our action in the sundry civil act repealed the provision in the post office act, the War Department declined to carry out the plain mandate of the provision of the first act, relating to the material to be delivered to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now we all agree, and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has admitted, that the Great Lakes are excluded, under the amendments already adopted, from the operation and jurisdiction of the Secretary of War and his engineers. If we vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri we simply throw the situation into doubt, and make possible a duplication of authority on the part of these two departments. It is certainly good legislation to make the whole situation abundantly clear by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri and thereby leave no room for possible controversy when this section comes to be construed by the departments.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, can not we close debate on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is already closed on the amendment, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I think this is simply an attempt to bring the waterways of this country under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have been there in the past and have been stifled by the railroads. Again, we are enacting legislation that will begin to place these waterways under the railroad commission, a commission that in all good reason we can only expect will do their best to make the railroads operative and not the waterways. I think they ought to be taken out altogether from any supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission and put into the hands of another body.

The gentleman from New York calls attention to the fact that the State of New York has spent three or four hundred million dollars on inland waterways which, if placed under the Interstate Commerce Commission, will be absolutely useless. If the Interstate Commerce Commission has anything to say about the shipping on the Great Lakes, you certainly do not expect the shipping on the Great Lakes to be a success. I do not. It should be under some other body. I have seen in my time three canals stifled by the railroads, and you will see many more if you let this go through. My opinion is on the question of rates that the Shipping Board and the railroad commission together should see that a proper proportion of the rates should be given to the water transportation. As a matter of fact, on the Pacific coast to-day the coastwise steamers are not making any money. They lost money last year and the year before because the railway commission had supervision over the railroads and the water carriers. I am opposed in every way to seeing this go out of the hands of a body that will have the interest of the waterways and the advancement of the waterways at heart, and that will try to bring about proper results, such as have been brought about by such bodies in other countries.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to speak against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. During the Sixty-fifth Congress a bill was passed authorizing the engineers of the War Department to make a survey of the feasibility and practicability of a canal connecting the Ohio River with Lake Erie and of the feasibility and practicability of a canal to connect Lake Erie at Toledo with Lake Michigan near Chicago. Money has been appropriated for that purpose. The engineers are now making that survey. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri should be agreed to, they will be able to investigate the subject matter of water terminals so long as it does not interfere with or connect either Lake Erie or Lake Michigan. They can investigate conditions in the Ohio River, but the minute they come within hailing distance of Lake Erie they will not be able to investigate as to the harbor facilities there. I have always considered the Great Lakes as inland waterways, and I think they are so considered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it ought to be made clear one way or the other, and that there should be no doubt about it.

Mr. WELTY. Assuredly, but it seems to me that it would be unwise to transfer the jurisdiction from one department to another at this time. We have for years permitted the Engineers of the War Department to make these investigations. Congress has spent almost $150,000,000 to canalize the Ohio River and its tributaries for the purpose of transporting coal north.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. In a moment. Yet nothing has been done in the way of utilizing canals to transport that coal north. When the coal arrives at Cincinnati it has to be unloaded there and transported over the railroad to Toledo and there again loaded onto the boats that go up the Great Lakes. The railroads now charge to transport that coal from Cincinnati to Toledo a dollar and a half a ton if it is river coal, but if they should happen to receive it from coal roads running into Cincinnati they charge only 62½ cents to transport it to Toledo. We have spent millions for the purpose of canalizing the Ohio and its tributaries, and do you want to transport that coal to the sunny South or to the North, where they need the coal during the winter months? It should be loaded onto the boats at the mines and transported by canal up through the Lakes to the North and Northwest.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman expect to get any rates out of the Interstate Commerce Commission that would make the waterways successful?

Mr. WELTY. This question is only as to the investigation. They are trying now to say that the Great Lakes are not inland waterways. They have appropriated $250,000 in the last Congress for the purpose of making a survey and have authorized the engineers of the War Department to make that survey, and now you are trying to say that the War Department engineers, when they get to Toledo or to some other port on Lake Erie, can not make an investigation in respect to facilities on Lake Erie. You have authorized a survey of a proposed canal from Toledo to Chicago. You will have to investigate terminal facilities at Toledo, and the moment you do that you have to investigate matters that pertain to Lake Erie. You will have to investigate terminal facilities at Chicago, and the moment you do that it affects Lake Michigan. It seems to me that it is simply a question of which department is given jurisdiction. You have appropriated the money to make these investigations and the War Department is now making the survey and I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri ought to be defeated.

Mr. Chairman, having been granted permission to extend my remarks, I want to call to the attention of the committee some facts which demonstrate that in making these improvements we should have one agency upon which Congress could depend in making them. I keenly realize that water transportation in this country is in its infancy and that before we can make a success we must have a definite policy.

When the question of water transportation first came up in this country steam, gasoline, and electrical power were not known. When these motive powers were harnessed no one thought that they could be utilized on canals. These canals were abandoned because of the advent of the steam and electric railroads. Now we are ready to abandon these roads for the flying machine. In our progress let us not forget that we have at least four mediums of transportation—water, air, highways for the motor trucks, and the steam and electric railways. All of these must be utilized in order to compete in the world's commerce. The stone, coal, ore, and other heavy, bulky products can be transported cheapest by water, while the finished products can be handled best on steel rails.

Oh, but there are some who saw the canal in its prime and decline, when the steam roads came into their own, but they are not able yet to realize why our railroads have failed to function in times of greatest need, nor do they fully appreciate the full value of our air service.

Congress acted very unwisely when it failed to make sufficient appropriation to keep the Air Service from going to pieces. The value of canals and air service are not fully appreciated by some, but I venture to say that we will see both of these again developed to such an extent that each will be given its proper work to perform.

The railroads are down and out. The people have contributed approximately $900,000,000 for their support, and this bill, realizing their helpless condition, makes a provision to guarantee their income after Federal control ceases. But, Mr. Speaker, to revert again to our waterways, I want to take this means of calling to the attention of the House some of the signs indicating a new deal in our transportation problems, and it will be the duty of Congress to support not only one, but all.

The first sign of the revival of waterways was in 1894, when surveys were authorized to deepen and widen the Erie Canal and "The Miami & Erie Canal, the Ohio Canal, and such other branches and report the feasibility and advisability of improving and widening such canals to 70 feet at water line and deepening the same to 7 feet." This act was passed by Congress August 17, 1894. A survey was made by the engineers as required by this act for a canal 10 feet deep and 85 feet wide, instead of as required by the act, because a 7-foot canal was not large enough for boats on the Lakes. The report was filed with the Secretary of War February 27, 1896, but I do not find where this Congress took any action upon this report until the passage of an act by the last Congress authorizing a survey of the Miami & Erie Canal or such other route as the engineers of the War Department deem feasible and practicable to connect the Ohio River with Lake Erie. The fact that nothing has been done by Congress would indicate that there was an adverse report by the War Department, and for the purpose of calling this matter to the attention of Congress, I want to submit a few extracts from that report.

In pursuance of the act of August 17, 1894, the War Department made a survey of three different routes through the State of Ohio between the Ohio River and Lake Erie. First, the eastern route, from Cleveland, on Lake Erie, to Marietta, on the Ohio River; second, the central route, from Sandusky Bay via the Sandusky River through Columbus to the Ohio River at Portsmouth; third, the western route, from Lake Erie, at Toledo, via the valleys of the Maumee and Auglaize Rivers, to the summit level across the divide between the St. Marys River, a tributary of the Maumee River, and Loramie Creek, a tributary of the Miami River, thence along the Miami Valley, via Dayton and Hamilton, to the Ohio River at Cincinnati.

Originally these three canals were built under acts of Congress in 1827 and 1828 from grants of land made by the United States to the State of Ohio. These grants were made by the United States with the following proviso: "The said canals, when completed or used, shall be, and forever remain, public highways for the use of the Government of the United States."

Originally these canals cost the Government over $16,000,000.

WATER SUPPLY.

In order that a canal may be successful it is necessary to have water sufficient at the summit, and because of an impression that there was not sufficient water I want to submit the report filed by the engineers which, in fact, is as follows:

The information so collected indicates that the supply of water would be adequate for a 7-foot, and probably for a 10-foot, canal on any of the three routes, and that on the various routes the following conditions prevail:

EASTERN ROUTE.

There is a deficiency in natural flow of tributary streams to meet the requirements of the summit level and adjacent slopes, for the operation of a canal of dimensions stated, during the entire period of navigation. The deficiency amounts to 2,209,000,000 cubic feet, which can only be provided for by the construction of storage reservoirs.

CENTRAL ROUTE.

The summit level and dependent slopes are naturally deficient in supply 4,665,000,000 cubic feet, to meet which it is practicable, after cutting the summit level down 40 feet, to establish at the headwaters of the Scioto a reservoir of 5,000,000,000 storage capacity. The annual "run-off" of the tributary area to this reservoir at 4.5 inches per annum is 5,362,000,000 cubic feet. The Licking Reservoir on the south slope could be drawn on for losses below Columbus to the extent of 750,000,000 cubic feet per annum.

In this connection it should be stated that if but one canal be constructed in the State of Ohio, and that one along this central route, the water now tributary to the western route could be taken from the Lewistown Reservoir for the supply of this central route.

The conclusion is that along this route a canal of the specified dimensions may be constructed with an abundant water supply by making a deep cut at the summit.

WESTERN ROUTE.

The summit level and dependent slope extend from St. Marys on the north to Piqua on the south. On the north slope feeders are taken in at St. Marys, at a point near Hamar, at Defiance and the Grand Rapids. On the south slope the points of feed along the Miami River are at Piqua, Troy, Dayton, Miamisburg, and Middleton.

The deficiency in flow at the summit level is 2,442,000,000 cubic feet, which must be supplied by storage, to meet which there are reservoirs now existing, viz, Loramie Reservoir, 600,000,000 cubic feet capacity; Lewistown Reservoir, 2,000,000,000 cubic feet capacity; and there is proposed a new reservoir at Port Jefferson, 3,000,000,000 cubic feet capacity.

The annual "run-off" in extreme dry years of tributary areas to these reservoirs is: Loramie, 732,000,000 cubic feet, or 132,000,000 in excess of capacity: Lawistown, 1,057,000,000 cubic feet, or 943,000,000 less than capacity; Port Jefferson, 3,272,000,000 cubic feet, or 272,000,000 more than its capacity. All of these reservoirs except Lewistown will be annually filled, and the entire run-off can be saved, either by feeding direct into the canal or diverted into the St. Marys Reservoir for storage. The annual run-off is 5,062,000,000 cubic feet and the requirements 3,151,000,000, or an excess of 1,911,000,000, for supplying a canal of the prescribed dimensions.

Capt. Chittenden shows that there is still further water capable of utilization, but the above statement includes all essential to demonstrate the practicability of the canal of the specified dimensions, still leaving a large excess of available water.

The configuration about this summit is such that it is believed that the run-off, as far as may be necessary, can be stored for use. The run-off either in dry years is in excess of requirements for the canal specified about 4,000 cubic feet per minute for the entire season.

In the valley of the Great Miami above Port Jefferson it is proposed to build a new reservoir. The site is one of the most advantageous in the State. The valley is inclosed by banks of sufficient height to retain the water within a narrow area, although the length of the reservoir would be more than 20 miles. The dam would be 40 feet in height. A feeder would be run from Cherokeemans Run to the Lewistown Reservoir so as to save the flow of this important stream.

Three large reservoirs are found at the summit of the western route belonging to the Miami & Erie Canal.

Reservoir.	Cost.	Area in acres.	Mean depth in feet.	Capacity in million cubic feet.
St. Marys, Mercer County	$528,227.07	13,440	7.6	4,500
Lewistown, Logan County	600,000.00	6,022	7.5	2,000
Loramie, Shelby County	22,000.00	2,464	6	600

The following is taken from Capt. Chittenden's report, on page 3025:

It should be borne in mind that throughout this discussion every assumption has been far on the safe side, and the aggregate factor of safety is large. In actual practice, with proper economy in management of the water supply, the results herein arrived at ought to be more than realized. In particular, the canal prism should be large enough to permit a temporary rise of at least 2 feet in the water surface for the storage of sutamer freshets, which would otherwise be lost.

Probably no action was taken by Congress on this report of 1896, because at that time the Ohio River and its tributaries had not been improved for navigation. An examination of the records discloses that it will only be a matter of a few years until the Ohio River and its tributaries can be used to transport the coal. If this is done, I want to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to permit the loading of coal on barges and transport the same to Cincinnati, Portsmouth, or Pittsburgh and there unloaded, to be reloaded on cars for transportation to the Lakes and again reloaded on barges for the Northwest, or is it the intention of Congress to take advantage of the improvement of the Ohio River and its tributaries by deepening and widening a canal or canals in order to transport the coal, without loading and unloading, through these canals over the Lakes for consumption in the North and Northwest?

Permit me to call to your attention the great future possibility of a canal connecting the Ohio River with the Lakes. The ore in the Northwest must come in contact with the coal found south of the Ohio River before it can be transformed into steel. Approximately 1 ton of flux stone is used for the purpose of manufacturing 1 ton of steel. The western part of Ohio has this limestone in abundance. No section of the United States is richer in agricultural products than western Ohio. If a canal is constructed between Cincinnati and Toledo, the coal in the South and the ore in the North would meet along the valley between Cincinnati and Toledo. If this canal is completed it will be possible to manufacture steel cheaper along this valley than anywhere in the United States.

Had the railroads more vision and less selfishness they could readily see that water transportation would be a benefit instead of a detriment to them, but from evidences in this bill it seems that they are fighting with the same old selfishness which has destroyed commerce. There was a time when our inland rivers were carrying all of the heavy products, but the railroads reduced the rates along these waterways below cost in order to destroy the competition and made the inland towns pay for their existence. The public has always paid the bills of this cut-throat competition and will continue to do so until they take a firm grip upon all of these transportation facilities with a view of having them serve the public and not their own selfish interests.

It seems that the railroads have procured about everything they have asked for in this bill. The Federal Government has already expended over $900,000,000 to keep them a going concern, and now they ask that this guaranty continue for six more months. They will grant the Federal Government a first lien only if practicable. Thus the war has given this agency of our Government the power to open up its Treasury for their own special benefit.

The bill provides a guaranty of the income they received for the three years ending June 30, 1917, averaging for the eastern district, consisting of 37 railroads, 11.48 per cent; for the southern district, consisting of 20 railroads, 12.37 per cent; while for the western district, consisting of 29 railroads, 9.96 per cent. It will be impossible for me to give the incomes of all of these roads, but under the plan recommended in the bill each of the companies will have for its stockholders annually during this period the following:

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co	8.92
The Pennsylvania Co	11.92
The New York Central Railroad Co	12.96
The Philadelphia & Reading Co	25.70
Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co	32.90
Michigan Central Railroad Co	18.48
Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey	20.25
Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co	11.50
Hocking Valley Railway Co	11.94
Illinois Central Railroad Co	11.53
Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co	16.75
Norfolk & Western Railway Co	12.51
Chesapeake & Ohio Lines	9.37
Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co	10.86
Central of Georgia Railway Co	9.39
Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway	13.60
Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co	14.76
Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co	44.99
Florida East Coast Railway Co	10.06
Chicago & North Western Railway Co	10.18
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co	22.05
Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co	12.09
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co	9.57
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co	9.70
Southern Pacific Co	6.60
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co	6.15
Great Northern Railway Co	9.63
Northern Pacific Railway Co	9.87
Union Pacific Railway Co	9.64

I have referred only to the largest systems, but to emphasize both the excessiveness of the standard, which this bill adopts, it may be well to suggest that the following will have for their stockholders:

Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co	647.22
The Chicago & Erie Railroad Co	70.45
New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Co	35.74
The Cumberland Valley Railroad Co	24.01
The Lehigh & Hudson River Railway Co	27.98
Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Co	21.67
Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railway Co	114.12
Duluth & Iron Range Railroad Co	38.27
Panhandle & Santa Fe Railroad Co	64.37
St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co	52.71
Colorado & Wyoming Railway Co	162.64

These are astounding figures which it seems the committee has overlooked altogether, especially when it is generally known that approximately $8,000,000,000 of the stock in these railroads is watered and has no value. And, again, Congress is going to tax the people for another six months in order that these railroads may have the incomes specified above.

Another matter that this bill is doing is the transfer of all of the rate making from the State to the Federal Government, and docks built by municipalities or States from funds collected from their own people will be controlled by the Federal Government instead of the municipality and the several States.

Again, the bill authorizes new loans to the railroads out of the Treasury of the United States, and no extension or improvement can be made unless the Interstate Commerce Commission, located at Washington, grants permission to make these improvements or extensions.

These are only a few objections that I have been able to discover the short time the bill was available. Again, I can not understand why a bill which has taken the committee months to prepare should now receive only a week's consideration by the House. Because of the work on the immigration committee and the special elections committee, I have been unable to examine this bill before it was considered in the House. In fact, it was not filed until Monday, and the House began consideration on Tuesday, and under a rule was continually in session from 10 o'clock in the morning until late at night in order to finish this most important piece of legislation which will likely come before this Congress.

Unless these and other matters are eliminated I will be constrained to vote against it, even though I deeply realize that Congress must pass some law to control the roads before they are returned to the owners.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment is closed. Gentlemen are proceeding only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ESCH. Is debate on the whole section also closed?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ESCH. I will say close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that debate upon the section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has been recognized; if the gentleman from Texas will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If it does not come out of my time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will wait until the gentleman concludes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not concerned where this work goes to, but I do want our inland waterways, and by that I mean our river waterways and canals, to be utilized. As long as they are kept under the wing of the Interstate Commerce Commission in connection with the administration of railroad operations they have minimized and crushed and killed until we have had no river or canal transportation. Every man interested in the great canal in New York knows what its fate has been. Now, in 1916 this Congress created a great body, to be known as the Shipping Board, and clothed it with jurisdiction over the shipping of this country on the high seas and the Great Lakes, and we did not go further and give interstate control over our inland waterways and rivers, and so forth, because that authority remained intrastate, and we hesitated at the beginning to do that. We provided that board, however, with authority to make investigation with reference to the shipping, not only of our Nation but of other nations, the great object being to build up a great merchant marine. We clothed it with authority to call on the President of the United States at any time for an apportionment to it of such officers from the Army as might be needed in its investigations in engineering work, and the Shipping Board has utilized Gen. Black, of the Engineer Corps. They have made a great investigation as to our necessities. Now, I think to take from them a great portion of their duties and begin to divide and distribute the work that ought to be done under the Shipping Board is a great mistake. Gentlemen, what I want to say is that the shipping of this country is one single project. Ships come from the seas up the rivers and distribute the products from overseas as well as from other States intrastate. What we want to do is to build up one grand system, and there ought to be one body in charge of that shipping interest, the water shipping interest of the United States. We give part of it to the War Department, and I want to call your attention to the absurdity, it seems to me, of the very language of this section. What has the War Department to do with the object of encouraging and developing water transportation facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States?

The Shipping Board, on the other hand, is a commercial body. The War Department has nothing to do with that. It is also to investigate the appropriate type of boats suitable for different classes of waterways, to investigate the subject of water terminals, both for water traffic and for through traffic by water and rail, including the necessary docks, warehouses, and so forth. Now, we have got a great body, which has spent a good deal of money which has done wonders in investigation. True, it was only created in 1916 and could not accomplish much in that length of time; but that body, fostered by this Congress, clothed with proper jurisdiction and appropriation, will do more to help the people to secure a merchant marine. And you can not cut that in two and make one part inland and the other ocean. We want one body controlling the merchant marine of the United States that is to be built up, and we ought to put this power in the Shipping Board. It really does not have any place in this bill, which has reference to giving back the railroads, unless we purpose by our course to subject the inland shipping of the country to the domination of the railroads, as it has been for the last 25 years to my knowledge, with the result we have had no inland shipping, and the Mississippi might as well be an island sand stream as for the commerce it has carried, and we can not get a boat up the Brazos or the Trinity Rivers at all——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And we could not get them if they were 40 feet deep and 2,000 feet wide.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. I wish to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] by striking out the word "not."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan to the amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: Strike out the word "not."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: Page 22, at the end of line 12, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"The words 'inland waterways' used in this section shall be construed to include the Great Lakes."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, would that be its reading if his amendment were adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as it would read if amended. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 53.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANKFORD: Page 22, line 5, after the word "railroads," insert: "To investigate the feasibility and practicability of proposed canals and canal improvements."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that all time is exhausted.

Mr. TILSON. Is not all the debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It was limited to 10 minutes, and there are 2 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that this amendment is proper. I can not see any reason why this Board of Engineers should not, along with their other duties, investigate the feasibility and practicability of canal improvements. They are purely inland waterways, and should be considered in connection with other inland waterway improvements. It seems to me there can be no just argument against the adoption of this amendment. I submitted the amendment to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the chairman of the committee, before I offered it, and I hope that he will agree with me that it is proper and will not injure the section, but will really help it and make the law a better one.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will that apply to canals not yet constructed? Will it make it necessary for these engineers to go and report on the feasibility and practicability of some canal that some canal company would want to build in a certain section of the country?

Mr. LANKFORD. It would authorize them to investigate the feasibility and practicability of such canal.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. This section authorizes the Secretary of War, with the object of promoting, encouraging, and developing water transportation, to do certain things. The amendment of the gentleman proposes an investigation of proposed canals. I think it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia proposes to investigate the feasibility and practicability of proposed canals and canal improvements. The Chair will state that this section under consideration contains this language:

And to investigate any other matter that may tend to promote and encourage water transportation.

In the opinion of the Chair the proposed amendment would be germane to the section containing such broad language as that relating to investigating matters pertaining to water transportation. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LANKFORD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. EDMONDS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Is it too late to offer an amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The motion to strike out being lost, a motion to strike out and insert would be in order.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Missouri: Page 21, line 8, after the word "Engineers," insert "with all reasonable dispatch and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAYBURN. We have now completed Title II and are coming to Title III, one of the most controversial titles, I am sure, in the bill. The House has sat more than seven hours and a half to-day already. It seems to me that it would be a very good idea to rise at this time before we start in with Title III, and then we can consider it all at one sitting of the House to-morrow. I just want to get the gentleman's idea about what he intends to do.

Mr. ESCH. I will say that after conferences with quite a number of Members of the House, it was thought preferable to run until 7 o'clock to-night and not recess and not hold a session after dinner. It was thought it would be difficult to hold a quorum after recess and that it would not be so difficult to hold one without a recess if we sat until 7.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is usually harder to hold a quorum from 6 until 7 than it is later in the evening.

Mr. ESCH. We hope we can make progress on the labor section. It is not likely that we shall conclude consideration of the labor section to-night.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think not.

Mr. ESCH. But there are some preliminary matters that might be disposed of this evening.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have a moment in which to ask a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, in charge of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to interrogate the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin please give heed to the gentleman from California?

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to suggest to the chairman of the committee, or rather would like to ask him, if it would not be possible to pass over Title III to-night and pass on to the consideration of Title IV, so that all the Members of the House would know that Title III would be taken up immediately in the morning?

Mr. ESCH. I think there is a good average attendance here now, and we might well proceed in regular order with the consideration of the bill. There are some Members who are interested in Title IV who understood it would not come up to-night and who are not now present.

Mr. NOLAN. Is there any prospect of prolonged discussion on that title?

Mr. ESCH. Amendments might be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I make the same request.

Mr. RAYBURN. I make the same request.

Mr. BRIGGS. And I the same.

Mr. KELLER. I make the same request.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks made in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks made in general debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to any of these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.—DISPUTES BETWEEN CARRIERS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES.

SEC. 300. When used in this title—

The term "carrier" means any carrier, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the commerce act, except a carrier engaged in the transportation of property by pipe line; and

The term "union" means any national craft, trade, labor, or industrial organization of employees, 5,000 or more of whose members are employees of carriers.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: On page 22, line 18, after the comma, insert the following: "except street, suburban, and interurban electric railways which are not a part or parts of a general steam railroad system of transportation and."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed that in the creation of the adjustment board and in allowing representation on such board to the employer and employee groups no provision is made for representation of employers or employees of street, suburban, and interurban electric railways. In view of the fact that such railways are for the most part local in their character, and the fact that over 80 per cent of their business is intrastate, and the further fact that the work of employees on these electric lines differs materially from work upon steam roads and the wage scales and working conditions differ, the hours of service may differ from those of the steam roads, and the fact that they, as a rule, are able to be at their homes, we are led to offer this amendment excluding these lines from the operation of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

I was in hopes that instead of further circumscribing this proposition contained in Title III we were going to enlarge it. What is the proposition with regard especially to the labor appeal board? We are asked to establish a board of nine members, who are to draw $10,000 a year from the Government, and to have a secretary drawing $5,000 a year, and to have commodious offices in the city of Chicago, and to have an unlimited board of employees, the number to be determined by the board itself, and the salaries paid to these employees are to be fixed by the board, all for what? For just one purpose. Although it is called a labor appeal board, it is to decide only one class of the numerous labor disputes, to wit, the disputes that occur between carriers and their employees.

It has been truthfully asserted here by more than one, especially by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and others, that the disputes between railroads and their employees are few in comparison with the number of labor disputes in this country. There might come a millennium when one year or two years or even three years would pass during which there would not be a railroad labor dispute, when there would not be a threatened strike by railroad employees. Yet we are to have this expensive board, consisting of as many members as our Supreme Court, nine in number, drawing salaries, as I said the other day, $2,500 more than that of a United States Senator, with all this board of employees, and all with nothing to do. I say it might happen, when they would be idle. Now, if we are going to have a labor appeal board, why do we not have one that can decide all labor disputes as they arise in the country and not limit them just to railroads?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Just one other thought. The Supreme Court sits right down the corridor here, with nine justices. Do they decide only one class of disputes? Why, no. They decide all Federal questions embraced within their jurisdiction. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think it would be a very happy state of things if this board did not have anything to do?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but we do not want any class of citizenship in these United States to be idle, because idleness is the devil's workshop. We want all men busy, and if we are going to have a board of nine members drawing $10,000 a year with a board of expensive employees we want them busy, because there are other disputes. There are 300 strikes in existence right to-day, big and little. There were 6,000 strikes in the United States from the 6th day of April, 1917, when war was declared, until the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, this board of labor appeals will not only decide disputes, but there is placed upon it the duty to study the working conditions and the different things in connection with wages of 2,000,000 employees.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, they do not even decide the disputes. The three members of this triumvirate representing the carriers sit with the three members representing the unions and the three members representing the public to hear evidence, but then when the decision is to be made the three representing the public, which is the most interested of all, have no voice in the determination of the dispute. But do the other six decide? No; they merely make recommendations. Will past history of such disputes authorize us to believe that the disputants will pay any attention to mere recommendations? The President has made recommendations in vain. He has implored coal strikers not to bring disaster upon the Nation, denouncing their action as unlawful and beseeching them to obey the law, only to be ignored, denounced, and condemned, and nothing short of a court's mandate even gave them pause.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing this Title III yesterday, I commended the speech made night before last by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER], stating that I was going to vote to carry out his suggestions, which I understood would be incorporated in an amendment to be offered by him in the form of a substitute. I did not get to hear the gentleman from Washington read his substitute, as I was called to my office on an important matter concerning coal restrictions in my district, and could only surmise from his argument what his substitute would contain, as his speech was not published in Tuesday's RECORD but first appeared in the back part of the RECORD this morning of yesterday's proceedings.

The main part of his argument, on pages 8357 and 8358, indorsed by me, was his criticism of the committee's bill and his advocating a labor appeal board whose decision would be final and enforcible, making strikes unlawful, and recognizing the rights of the 110,000,000 people of the United States superior to the rights of any particular class.

To my surprise, upon reading the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER], printed on page 8359 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I find that he has given no recognition whatever to the rights of the general public and has given the public no representation whatever on his proposed labor board. While I heartily indorse a part of this substitute, I can not support it unless it is amended to allow the public some representation. For years and years capital and labor have reached agreements which have been to the detriment of the public. Employees have made demands and employers have promptly granted same, but immediately placing the burden upon the consuming public, which pays the price. As long as capital can pass the burden on to the public, what does it care about the nature and extent of labor demands? If the public had no voice, capital might be willing to grant all demands made upon it by labor. Moreover, I can not agree with my colleague from Washington in his proposal to fix the salaries of these board members at $10,000 and $12,000. We get good men to serve as United States Senators and Congressmen for only $7,500. Why should we pay $10,000 and $12,000?

Mr. BLANTON had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to offer a substitute to the entire Title III, and I do not wish to lose my rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer a substitute for the entire title. It will have to be done as the sections are read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I dislike to offer a long substitute paragraph by paragraph. The substitute I propose is the Sweet plan, which has been carefully thought out. I would like to make a request by which the substitute can be offered as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman might offer the substitute to the first section in Title III.

Mr. WEBSTER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is answering a parliamentary inquiry propounded by the gentleman's colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the Chair if all of section 300 has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that section 300 has been read. The bill is being read by sections.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for section 300.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 22, line 13, strike out all of section 300 and all of Title III of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Clerk has read far enough to show that it is not a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, as an amendment I offer a substitute for section 300 just read and for all the succeeding section to Title III of the bill dealing with disputes between carriers and their employees, and give notice that in the event the substitute is adopted I shall move to strike out all the sections to Title III as they appear in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order. It is not offered as a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, I again, by way of amendment to section 300, offer a substitute for that section and all the succeeding sections to Title III of the bill dealing with disputes between carriers and their employees, and give notice that if the amendment should be adopted I shall move to strike the succeeding sections of the title from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers a substitute for section 300, just read, giving notice that if the substitute for that section is adopted he will move to strike the other sections from the bill. The Clerk will report the substitute.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to reserve any points of order that may be applicable to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the substitute must be read before points of order can be made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand my substitute was ruled out of order because an amendment was pending. I now desire to offer that substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's colleague has been recognized to offer a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.—DISPUTES BETWEEN CARRIERS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES.

SEC. 300. There is hereby created a board composed of nine members, to be known as the board of railroad wages and working conditions, hereinafter referred to as the board. The members of the board shall be appointed by the President in the following manner: Four members shall be selected from a list of nine names submitted to the President by the executives of the railroad labor organizations; four members shall be selected from a list of nine names submitted by the executives of railroad companies. The eight members thus named shall meet within 10 days from the date of their appointment and shall at once proceed to elect a chairman who shall constitute the ninth member of the board. If within 10 days from such meeting the members fail to elect a chairman as aforesaid, the President shall appoint a chairman, who shall serve for seven years, and who shall hold office until his successor be named and qualified in the same manner as heretofore provided. Two other members shall be appointed for a term of seven years each; the other members shall be appointed for terms of six, five, four, three, two, and one years as the President may designate, and all appointments or reappointments thereafter shall be for seven years, and each member shall hold his office until his successor be named and qualified. All vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments. Not more than five members of the board shall be members of the same political party. The chairman shall receive a salary of $12,000 and each member shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, together with the necessary traveling expenses while on the discharge of official duties, to date from his taking the oath of office.

SEC. 301. The board is hereby authorized and empowered, in all cases of disputes between any common carrier by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, subject to the act to regulate commerce, and its employees as to wages, terms, and conditions of employment, hours of service, or working conditions, after full hearing to prescribe what is, or may be for the future, the just and reasonable wages, terms, and conditions of employment, hours of service, or working conditions, and to issue an order to such carrier to comply with such decision of the board; and such carrier shall conform to such order or requirement and shall not depart from the conditions so prescribed; such order to remain in effect until further order of the board. The board may, upon complaint of any interested party or upon its own motion, suspend or modify its findings and order after giving notice thereof to the interested parties in person, if practicable, otherwise by publication.

SEC. 302. The board shall have power to make its own rules of procedure, summon witnesses, administer oaths, order the production of documents deemed necessary by it in any dispute, and employ a secretary, attorneys, and other persons necessary to the execution of its power; and the board is authorized to use and continue the services and authority of the boards heretofore organized by the Director General of Railroads, known as railway adjustment boards, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and the board of railway wages and working conditions. The records, rules, and regulations made and promulgated by the said boards and their services may be utilized, and their rules, regulations, and duties may be altered, changed, or modified by the board created by this act, and until so altered, changed, or modified, and, in so far as they may be deemed applicable, the rules and regulations promulgated by said boards, heretofore approved by the Director General of Railroads, may be continued in full force and effect.

SEC. 303. When a wage or labor dispute is brought before the board, hearing shall be held at the time, place, and manner to be determined by the board. The board shall speedily and without delay make its findings in writing and shall serve them on the parties in interest. The findings of the board shall be final and the parties thereto shall be bound thereby.

SEC. 304. It shall be unlawful for any group of employees to enter upon a strike before its controversy with the employer common carrier or carriers has been submitted to the board and until the board has made a finding thereon. If the employer common carrier or carriers conform to the findings of the board, the right of such group or groups thereafter to strike in order to obtain their demands in issue in the controversy thus decided by the board is hereby prohibited and such act shall be unlawful.

SEC. 305. If after such hearing and finding of the board an employer common carrier or carriers shall fail or refuse to abide by such findings, such carrier or carriers shall be liable for the full damages to any employee, or group of employees, whether members of any labor union or organization or not, arising from such breach. Any labor union, or any employee, or group of employees, may commence and prosecute an action for the recovery of the amount due, and in such case the court shall include in any judgment rendered in favor of any employee, union, organization, or group of employees the costs of the action, including a reasonable attorney's fee, which, when recovered, shall be paid to the employee, group of employees, union, or organization, as the case may be.

SEC. 306. Any employee, group of employees, labor union, or organization which authorizes any member to strike or break any contract of hire fixed or approved by the board, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, procures, or consents to, or in any manner conspires to effect any breach of findings and conclusions of the board, shall be liable for the full damages to the railroad company or companies arising from such breach. For the purpose of enforcing such liability (1) service of process or notice may be made upon any employee, employees, chief executive officer, or other official of any labor union or organization; (2) no action for such damages shall abate by reason of death, resignation, removal, or legal incapacity of any official or member of a labor union or organization, or of any change in the membership thereof; (3) such action if brought against any labor union or organization may be prosecuted in its recognized group name; (4) the action, however, shall run against the union or organization jointly and severally against it and the members thereof, or against the employees individually as the carrier or carriers may elect; (5) satisfaction of any judgment rendered shall be made from the property of the union or organization or any member or members of the offending union, or from the property of any offending employee or group of employees sued by name: Provided, That no insurance, pension, or sick-benefit fund shall be subject to the satisfaction of any such judgment.

SEC. 307. Wherever the word "group" is used herein it shall be held to mean two or more employees, and where the word "strike" is used it shall be held to mean the abandonment of employment by such group pursuant to an agreement, an understanding, or by concert of action: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

SEC. 308. There is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended by the board of railroad wages and working conditions for defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of such board, including the payment of salaries as provided in this title.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] is recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve all points of order against the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves all points of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill is to provide for two boards, one an adjustment board to hear the complaints made at first by either the carriers or the employees of the railroads, and the other board is to be a board of appeals, to which an appeal may be made from the decision of the adjustment board. The provisions of the bill, as the Chair knows, were brought before the House under a rule. This substitute leaves out the adjustment board and leaves out the board of appeals and brings in an entirely new idea in the shape of one board for hearing and final determination. The proposed substitute does not in any way recognize the interest of the general public in the controversial matters and allows representation only to the carriers and employees and gives no representation whatever to the public. This legislation is designed specially to protect the general public from the menaces and dangers of these disputes. The substitute absolutely ignores this purpose by failing to allow members on this proposed board specially selected to represent the public. It is not germane to the purpose or intent or subject matter of the bill, and therefore I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect is the proposed substitute not germane to the provisions of the bill to which it is offered or the purposes of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. For the reasons that I have stated. I tried to make them as clear as possible. The Chair usually is able to understand a statement very readily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman referred to the bill being brought in under a special rule. Does he understand that that precludes changing the general plan which the committee has reported for adjusting these disputes?

Mr. BLANTON. It limits it to the main subject matter of the bill itself which is brought in under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone else desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against each section as it may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will lie to the entire substitute at this time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the substitute just read makes the award practically mandatory and any violation of it unlawful. There is no such provision in the pending measure, thus differentiating the two measures in a very marked degree, because it is the method of enforcement after all that is the crucial question in this labor legislation. It is practically offering a criminal statute, whereas in the bill that is presented here before the House it is simply a right of action for civil damages.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] should be sustained, it would be utterly impossible to offer any amendment to Title III which differentiates itself in any way from the provisions of that title as carried in the bill. Title III is an attempt on the part of the legislature to deal in a complete and positive way with the entire question of labor disputes in connection with the operation of the railroads under this bill, and the mere fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] proposes an entirely different method, or in one particular deals with the problem in a different way, than the proposition of the committee does not render the amendment of the gentleman from Washington subject to the point of order as not being germane. I do not agree with the provisions that the gentleman from Washington has offered, but the duty of the Chair is clearly not only to protect the House and the committee from amendments which are not germane, but the duty of the Chair is also to protect the right of a Member to offer an amendment which is germane. As I have said, if an amendment is held to be not germane simply because in one particular or in many particulars it deals with one subject in a different way than that which is proposed in the bill then it will never be possible to offer an amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not if the Chair is ready to rule. I do not care to take up time unnecessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman, although the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. The labor provision of the bill as reported to the House creates certain machinery to which either one side or the other may go voluntarily to settle their disputes. There is no provision in the pending bill that compels men to resort to this tribunal for the purpose of settling their disputes nor that compels the roads themselves to resort thereto; and after they have resorted to this tribunal they are not compelled by the enactment of any criminal provisions of the statute to abide by the result. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] seeks to compel the disputants to resort to the machinery which he sets up for the settlement of their disputes, and after they have been compelled to go there they are compelled to abide by the decision or be guilty of a violation of law and subject to criminal prosecution.

Now, fundamentally the two propositions are entirely different, and it strikes me in a proposition to create machinery for voluntary use of two sides in a dispute it is not germane to substitute a provision for compelling them to resort to the machinery set up in the substitute, making them guilty of violating a criminal statute if they do not abide by the decision. For that reason I do not believe the substitute is germane to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit me one further word, one of the main purposes of Title III in the bill before the committee is to take care of the public's interest in railroad disputes. It is to look after the interests of the general public and to protect the general public from the menace which grows out of such disputes. Now, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Washington wholly ignores that subject. It absolutely ignores the question of the general public's interest in the legislation. It nowhere provides representation on the part of the general public in the plan of adjustment, and I say it is an entirely different idea and is a departure from the subject matter of the committee's bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, fundamentally the sections proposed to be stricken out, and the substitute have much in common. Their purpose is undoubtedly the same namely to provide a method for settling labor disputes. Their differences of detail are not distinctive of their kinship, and germaneness is kinship. Both plans propose to solve this problem by the establishment of boards. This being so, the mere fact that the purpose common to the two, namely the effective composition of labor disputes in the railway world, is sought to be effected by plans greatly variant in executive details, though fundamentally alike in conception does not at all establish that the two plans are not related to each other, or that this substitute is not germane to the sections of the bill. I can not agree with the statement made that fundamentally, the two plans are different. Rather, it seems to me, they are fundamentally alike, and closely cognate, since they have a common purpose, and seek to make that purpose effective respectively, through specially constructed boards. Having this much in common, a large latitude as to details may be allowed, without destruction of the kinship between the two. I submit that upon the whole, the substitute plan is reasonably akin to the plan of the bill, and is therefore germane, and in order

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] offers an amendment by way of substitute consisting of some six or eight sections amending the provisions of Title III of the bill, section 300 of that title having been read. The title of that portion of the bill to which the amendment is offered is headed, "Disputes between employers and their employees." The various sections of the bill set up and provide certain machinery by which disputes between carriers and their employees may be adjusted. Provision is made for the appointment of certain groups of employees, representatives of carriers, representatives of the express companies, as well as representatives of the public. The procedure of settling and adjusting these differences is set forth in the bill. The powers and duties of the organization provided for are also set forth. The bill as reported provides for two boards or two bodies which shall consider disputes affecting labor upon carriers. First is the adjustment board, as it is called, the members of which are directed to refer disputes to a conference committee, and thereafter the matter is passed on to what is known as the board of labor appeals. The board of labor appeals is a board appointed under the provisions of the act, with authority to make its findings, for the disregard of which by either the carrier or employee suits are authorized to be brought against the property of the carrier or against the common property of the organization of employees in such sum as may be determined upon in damages. Now, that is in a sense, in the view of the Chair, a penalty imposed upon either party in the dispute for disregarding or failing to follow the findings of this organization provided for in the bill, a penalty by way of a civil suit authorized to recover damages. This in general very briefly outlines the procedure and the machinery set up in the bill for the determination of these suits. In place of this machinery the gentleman from Washington proposes a substitute which sets up a board of nine members, to be known as the board of railroad wages and working conditions. They are to be appointed by the President, four members to be selected from the list of nine names submitted by the executives of the railroad labor organizations, four members to be selected from a list of nine names submitted by the executives of the railroad companies. Those eight members after their selection meet and choose a chairman. They hold office for a prescribed term of years and receive a salary from the Federal Treasury, so that the substitute provides one board instead of the two organizations in the original bill. In the original bill one board receives salary out of the Federal Treasury and the other does not, as the Chair understands. In this respect the Chair is of opinion that the substitute proposition is a germane one.

The board created by the provisions of the substitute is authorized in all cases of dispute between common carriers and their employees as to wages to hold hearings and to issue an order to the carrier to comply with the decision of the board. The carrier is required to conform to such order, and then the board is authorized, upon complaint of any interested party or upon its own motion, to suspend or modify its findings. The Chair thinks that in that respect the substitute is germane to the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee and to the main purposes of the bill as a whole. The board is also authorized to summon witnesses and make rules for its own procedure, similar to the authority conferred upon the board of railway appeals in the original act.

The substitute further provides that when a wage or labor dispute is brought before the board the hearing shall be held speedily, without delay, and that a finding shall be made in writing, and that the findings of the board shall be final, and that the parties thereto shall be bound thereby. In this respect the Chair is of the opinion that while the provisions of the substitute go beyond, perhaps, the provisions of the original bill, they relate to a similar subject. But they treat it in a somewhat different way, and because of strengthening in a sense the effect of the action of the organization or board or committee which is created by the substitute, that therefore it is germane.

Section 304 makes it unlawful for any group of employees to enter upon a strike before its controversy with the employer common carrier or carriers has been submitted to the board and until the board has made a finding thereon.

It also provides:

If the employer common carrier or carriers conform to the findings of the board, the right of such group or groups thereafter to strike in order to obtain their demands in issue in the controversy thus decided by the board is hereby prohibited and such act shall be unlawful.

The Chair thinks that the effect of this provision is to say that, while the machinery set up by the substitute is operating and considering the dispute, one of the group of parties or class of parties which is subject to the dispute shall not strike, as it is used in the language of the substitute, and that, if they do, it is unlawful, and that the right of this group to strike in order to obtain their demands is prohibited. This raises a different question than that presented by the language of the original bill. The original bill, as the Chair recalls, does not use the term "strike," but considers this question as a matter of dispute between employees and employers. However, the language of section 304 of the substitute is such as to limit the freedom of action, so to speak, while certain people remain employees, in prescribing what they shall not do while their dispute is being considered and after it has been determined or settled.

While this goes much beyond the scope of the original bill, and while the Chair realizes that it is perhaps a close question, in the view of the Chair the provision of section 304 is not such as would impel the Chair to rule the provision as not germane. He would hold that provision as germane to the provisions of the bill. The mere fact that the substitute provides it shall be made unlawful instead of providing that the penalty shall be by way of a civil suit for damages does not take it out of the rule of germaneness.

The other sections of the substitute provide that if after hearing either party shall fail to abide by the decision they shall be subject to a suit for damages. Section 306 is somewhat similar to the section in the original bill which prevents anybody from aiding, abetting, or inciting anybody to break the terms of any contract. Section 307 is simply giving a definition to the word "group" and also to the word "strike." That contains a proviso:

That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

Section 308 contains an appropriation for the fiscal year of $100,000.

The Chair is of the opinion, upon an examination of the terms both of the original bill and of the substitute, that simply providing a different form of machinery in carrying perhaps further the effect of disregarding the findings of the machinery provided, and providing a different method of enforcing the findings of the board, are not such differences as would result in making the substitute out of order on the ground of germaneness; and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] is recognized.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I discussed this amendment at considerable length during the general debate, and its salient provisions have been clearly stated in outline by the Chairman in ruling upon the point of order, I think I shall not further inflict myself upon the committee unless some gentleman desires to ask me some question with reference to the amendment.

Mr. VAILE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEBSTER. Very well.

Mr. VAILE. I notice in section 306 of the gentleman's proposed substitute that he provides that any union which authorizes any member to strike shall be liable for full damages, and in subdivision 5 of the same section he provides:

Satisfaction of any judgment rendered shall be made from the property of the union or organization or any member or members of the offending union.

Let me suggest this inquiry to the gentleman: Suppose the gentleman now occupying the chair [Mr. WALSH] and myself and the gentlenfan from Washington are members of a union. Two of us and those we represent vote to go on strike in violation of this contract. The gentleman from Washington votes against the strike. He is outvoted and the union goes out on strike. Would the judgment against the offending union be satisfied by levying on the property of the gentleman from Washington, who voted against the strike?

Mr. WEBSTER. Certainly. If you establish any other rule—the union will have their votes on strikes by secret ballot—you will have no way of fixing personal responsibility.

Mr. VAILE. But the member of the union who might be entirely disposed to abide by the contract would nevertheless be at the mercy of his associates?

Mr. WEBSTER. But the member of a union incurs a burden as well as a benefit when he joins the organization, and if his organization, acting in matters pertaining to its jurisdiction, binds him he can not say he has acted against his will. He goes into the union knowing its jurisdiction and authority with respect to calling strikes.

Mr. VAILE. I merely wanted to get the gentlenfan's position on it. I think the result would be very unfair.

Mr. WEBSTER. If you would undertake to confine the levy of execution on the property of the individual members of the union who were personally present at the time the action was taken and who voted in the affirmative in calling the strike, you would nullify this section. There would be no way to establish either fact. Their sessions are secret. There would be no means by which you would be able to determine which individuals voted or how.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBSTER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with one feature of the gentleman's amendment—that it should be a final settlenfent whatever action is taken. That was the general principle on which I agreed with the gentleman all through. But I notice that the gentleman absolutely overlooked the general public in this decision. While the carriers and employees form probably not more than three or four or five million persons, the general public outside of either interest is composed of about 105,000,000 persons. Why is the general public overlooked in the representation?

Mr. WEBSTER. Does the gentleman from Texas believe that the public interests are overlooked when the selection of this committee, including the chairman if the eight members are unable to agree, is made by the President of the United States?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, when you let a railroad corporation submit certain names from which four members are to be selected those four members represent the railroad, and likewise with respect to the union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think I express the sentiment of every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when I say that this labor section gave us a great deal of thought and worry. The committee did the very best they could on this question, and I know that our worthy chairman, Mr. ESCH, was very fair at all times and that he did the best he could to try and do justice to all. Something has been said here today about what happened in the committee during the executive session. The Webster proposition was offered in the committee, and of the 21 members of the committee it received only 2 votes. If you gentlemen of this House want to vote for a proposition which will prohibit a strike, if you want to make it permissible for the employer to go and take the home away from the humble employee because he may have made some little mistake or made some remark relative to an adjustment made by a labor adjusting board down here in Washington, why vote for Judge WEBSTER's amendment. That is what it will do. The employer has the power under the Webster amendment to take the home of every workingman who by voice or in any other way advocates setting aside the decisions rendered by this board.

Oh, yes, I have heard some Members of the House in the last two or three days, all of whom profess to be friends of the laboring man, express their views as to what they thought ought to be done to labor unions (I wish I could believe that they were). The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] complained here yesterday about not placing in this bill a provision to take away from the wife and the little children of an employee the insurance upon which a man had been paying for years. The gentleman from Texas is a lawyer, I am not, but I want to say to him that he knows that in any civil suit for damages the life insurance of a man is always protected, and you can not levy on that life insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman would not want to do me an injury or to make a misstatement.

Mr. COOPER. I do not want to do the gentleman an injury.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman complained because we had eliminated benefits and insurance from being levied upon in case of a violation of contract.

Mr. BLANTON. Not insurance. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. COOPER. If I am mistaken, I apologize to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not refer to insurance, but to a testament that would constitute funds of the organization. I merely mentioned the fact that we——

Mr. COOPER. I am quite sure I am not mistaken. I heard the gentleman's remarks; and I may be mistaken, but I do not believe I was.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, our Nation is confronted to-day with far more serious questions and problems than we ever were at any time during the war period or in the entire history of our Nation, and I feel sure that one of the greatest questions we are facing at this hour is the labor problem. No one will deny that for some time past the radical element have got control of certain labor organizations and the conservative American labor leader has been pushed aside. I am one of those who believe this would not have taken place if it had not been for the war. There were many things disorganized during the trying time of the war period, and labor, to some extent, was no exception; and at this trying time of the reconstruction period I want to plead with you Members of Congress to go slow and consider well your actions when you attempt to strike at the radical agitator—and I will go all the way with you along this line—that you do not unjustly injure and punish the decent, law-abiding, patriotic American workingman, of which there are hundreds of thousands in our country; and while I plead and stand by the true American workingman, I can not find words to express my contempt for the radicals who to-day are trying to sow the seed of discontent and lawlessness in the ranks of the laboring class at this hour.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I am very much interested in the subject. I have in my district four large terminal yards of railroad—two on the Norfolk & Western, one on the Virginian, and one on the Chesapeake & Ohio—and I feel very kindly toward those boys. I want to ask the gentleman what he thinks of this title as written in this bill, Title III?

Mr. COOPER. I will be pleased to express myself on that before we get through with this title. Now, surely this House can not accuse me of being a radical or a Bolshevik. I have always, as the committee knows, favored conservative, honest labor organizations. [Applause.] But I have never hesitated to expose and attack anyone, whether he was a member of a labor union or not, if he advocated anything that would cause injury to others or was in violation of the laws of our country. If I had my way about it, we would take this radical element—these Bolshevists and soviets who are now stirring up disturbances from one end of the land to the other—and we would either put them in prison or send them out of the country.

A short time ago I stood on this floor and warned organized labor and our country against the radical leadership of William Z. Foster, the anarchist and syndicalist, who has been so prominent in the steel strike. At the time I exposed Foster there were over 40,000 men in my district affected by this strike, and I have been bitterly condemned for my action in this matter; but this matters not to me, for if there ever was a time when a Member of Congress should forget his future political ambitions and stand for justice and law and order it is to-day; and God grant that the time will never come when I shall act the cowardly part for political expediency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. I have not taken a minute's time on this bill before.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, there are some things in the committee provision that I would like to see amended when we get to those sections, but the one underlying thought that the committee had was to try, if possible, to organize some Government tribunal whereby the railroad employees and employers could come to a settlement of their disputes. I believe in that kind of arbitration. Why, for years the railroad employees have met at the table with their management, and they have been able to settle their disputes, and I do not believe we have had any great general railroad strike in this country since 1894, and we all know that strike was led by a radical who is now serving a term in one of our Federal prisons for his disloyal actions and utterances during the war.

Mr. WEBSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBSTER. Does not the gentleman know that the substitute I have proposed authorizes a continuance of these very boards through the medium of which these disputes have been settled?

Mr. COOPER. You have such a provision in your amendment, but you go further than that.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the provisions in this bill would be more effective in settling disputes between railroad employees and the employers than the old plan; and if so, why? The reason I ask the question is that I do not see how these provisions will be very effective.

Mr. COOPER. I shall be pleased to try and answer the gentleman from New York a little later on. We all know that since the war began in 1914 that the world-wide conditions have changed, and that we are passing through a reaction which we have never experienced before. When we took the railroads over under Government control, the railroad employees were free, and they did not have their hands shackled and bound.

I am not one of those who wants to send the railroads back to their original owners and give to the operators benefits in the way of appropriations, loans, and so forth, so that they can operate the railroads in a successful way. But I also want to grant to the employees of the railroads the same privilege. For years arbitration has been successful in the settlement of labor disputes.

There are people in this country to-day who seem to feel jubilant over the downfall of organized labor in the last three or four months, and they believe that now is the time to crush them entirely by reason of the action of some of the radical element; and most of the trouble has been brought about by a radical element since the war began. But I am not one of those who want to make the conservative, decent, law-abiding American workmen suffer for something that the radical has done. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] has an amendment which he will offer in place of Judge WEBSTER's proposition, which provides that the railroad employees will work along the lines that they always have done in trying to settle disputes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COOPER. May I ask for two minutes more?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. The railroad employees will try to settle their disputes as they always have done in the past. In other words, if the Sweet amendment is adopted, and I do not believe the committee will have very much objection to the amendment, for I think it is along the line they want to work. The amendment provides that whenever a question is in dispute it is taken up by the local board. If the local board can not settle it with the superintendent, the general board takes hold of it and takes it to the general management. I am of the opinion that there will be many times when the local and general board can settle these disputes without bringing them to Washington at all. In case the general board can not agree, then the question will be submitted to the board of dispute here in Washington.

I feel confident that if the employees—and I want to say that the officials of the railroad labor organizations are a high class of intelligent, law-abiding American citizens—if they can only sit down at the table with equal representation of their employers, I do not believe that you will have very much labor trouble or many labor disputes in the future as far as the railroads are concerned.

If the amendment of Judge WEBSTER is adopted, you shackle and handcuff every laboring man so that if he should in any case decide not to abide by the decision of this board, then the employer can go into court and take his little home from him and everything else that he has. I hope that the committee will not adopt this amendment, but will accept the substitute offered by Mr. ANDERSON, which is the Sweet amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON to the substitute: After the words "SEC. 300" strike out all the remainder of the substitute and insert the following:

"That it shall be the duty of all carriers subject to this act, and their agents, officers, and employees to exert every reasonable effort and adopt every available and reasonable means to avoid interruption to the operation of a carrier subject to this act growing out of controversy or dispute over any question of wages, working conditions, or discipline of employees.

"Questions affecting wages, working conditions, or discipline of employees on a carrier's line shall be considered, and if possible adjusted in conference between representatives of the class or classes of employees affected, or to be affected, thereby, and representatives of the carrier or carriers designated or authorized by it to so act. If any such question can not be adjusted in such conferences, it shall be referred to the appropriate board of adjustment hereinafter provided for. If such question can not be decided or adjusted by such board, it shall be referred to the commission on labor disputes hereinafter provided for.

"Boards are hereby created and established, to be known as railway board of adjustment No. 1, railway board of adjustment No. 2, and railway board of adjustment No. 3, for the purpose of handling and adjusting disputes that have not otherwise been disposed of, affecting the question of wages, working conditions, discipline, and personal grievances of employees of carriers subject to this act.

"Railway board of adjustment No. 1, represented by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

"Railway board of adjustment No. 2, represented by the International Association of Machinists; the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers of America; the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America; the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance; and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

"Railway board of adjustment No. 3, represented by the Order of Railway Telegraphers, Switchmen's Union of North America, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, and the United Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees and Railroad Shop Laborers.

"All controversies growing out of questions of wages, the interpretation or application of the provisions of wage schedules or agreements which are not promptly adjusted by the officials and the employees on any of the carrier lines subject to the provisions of this act, shall be disposed of in the following manner:

"There shall be created within 30 days after the passage of this act a board to be known as railway board of adjustment No. 1, to consist of eight members, four to be selected and compensated by the carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, and one each by the chief executive officer of each of the four organizations of employees hereinbefore named, and to be compensated by such organization.

"There shall be created within 30 days after the passage of this act a board to be known as railway board of adjustment No. 2, to consist of 12 members, 6 to be selected and compensated by the carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and 1 each by the chief executive officer of each of the six organizations of employees hereinbefore named, and to be compensated by such organization.

"There shall be created within 30 days after the passage of this act a board to be known as railway board of adjustment No. 3, to consist of 8 members, 4 to be selected and compensated by the carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, and 1 each by the chief executive officer of each of the four organizations of employees hereinbefore named, and to be compensated by such organization.

"The aforesaid railway boards of adjustment shall meet in the city of Washington within 10 days after the selection of their members and each elect a chairman and vice chairman, who shall be members of the board, and each chairman or vice chairman shall preside at all meetings of their respective boards and shall be required to vote upon the adoption of all decisions of the board of which they are members.

"The boards shall meet regularly at stated times each month and continue in session until all matters before them are considered.

"Unless otherwise mutually agreed, all meetings of the boards shall be held in the city of Washington: Provided, That each board shall have authority to empower two or more of its members to conduct hearings and pass upon controversies, when properly submitted, at any place designated by the board: Provided further, That such subdivision of the board will not be authorized to make final decision. All decisions shall be made and approved by the entire board, as hereinbefore provided.

"Should a vacancy occur in any board, for any cause, such vacancy shall be immediately filled by the same appointive authority which made the original selection.

"All authority invested in the committee commonly known as the 'commission of eight' to adjust disputes arising out of the application of the so-called eight-hour law is hereby transferred to railway board of adjustment No. 1, in the same manner as has heretofore been done by the commission of eight. All decisions of a general character heretofore made by the so-called commission of eight or by the United States Railroad Administration, affecting the questions of wages, hours of service, or conditions of employment, are hereby confirmed and shall apply to all carriers subject to this act, unless exempted in such eight-hour law. Decisions which have been rendered by the so-called commission of eight or the United States Railroad Administration, and which apply to individual carriers subject to the provisions of ths act, shall remain in effect until superseded by mutual agreement between the carrier and the employees, or by the decision of railway board of adjustment No. 1, or the commission on labor disputes, made in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"All decisions of a general character heretofore made by the United States Railroad Administration affecting the questions of wages, hours of service, or conditions of employment are hereby confirmed and shall apply to all carrier lines subject to this act. Decisions which have been rendered by the United States Railroad Administration, and which apply to the individual carriers subject to the provisions of this act, shall remain in effect until superseded by mutual agreement between the carrier and the employees or by decision of railway board of adjustment No. 2, or railway board of adjustment No. 3, or the proper Commission on Labor Disputes made in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"The respective railway boards of adjustment shall render decisions on all matters in dispute and as provided herein and when properly submited to the boards.

"Questions of wages, hours of service, and conditions of employment, including controversies arising from interpretation of wage agreements, shall be decided by the railway boards of adjustment when properly presented to them.

"Wages, hours of service, and conditions of employment, when fixed by the boards or commissions on labor disputes, shall be incorporated in existing agreements on the several carrier lines subject to the provisions of this act, and should differences arise between the officials and the employees of any of the carriers subject to this act as to such incorporation, intent, or application, such questions of difference shall be decided by the respective railway boards of adjustment when properly presented.

"Personal grievances or controversies arising under interpretation of wage agreements and all other disputes arising between officials of any carrier subject to this act and its employees will be handled in their usual manner by general committees of their employees up to and including the chief operating officer of the carrier (or some one officially designated by him), when, if an agreement is not reached, the chairman of the general committee of employees may refer the matter to the chief executive officer of the organization concerned; and if the contention of the employees' committee is approved by such executive officer of the organization, then the chief operating officials of the carrier and the chief executive officer of the organization concerned shall refer the matter with all supporting papers to the proper railway board of adjustment, which board shall promptly hear and decide the case, giving due notice to the chief operating officer of the carrier interested and the chief executive officer of the organization concerned of the time set for hearing.

"No matter will be considered by the respective railway boards of adjustment unless officially referred to them in the manner herein prescribed.

"In hearings before the respective railway boards of adjustment, in matters properly submitted for their consideration, the carrier shall be represented by such person or persons as may be designated by the chief operating officer and the employees shall be represented by such person or persons as may be designated by the chief executive officer of the organization concerned.

"All clerical and office expenses shall be paid by the United States Government. The carrier directly concerned and the organization involved in the hearing will, respectively, assume any expense incurred in presenting a case.

"In each case an effort should be made to present a joint concrete statement of facts as to any controversy, but the respective boards are fully authorized to require information in addition to the concrete statement of facts, and may call upon the chief operating officer of the carrier or the chief executive officer of the organization concerned for additional evidence, either oral or written.

"All decisions of the respective railway boards of adjustment shall be approved by a majority vote of all members of such board.

"After a matter has been considered by a board, and in the event a majority vote can not be obtained, then any four members of railway board of adjustment No. 1 or any six members of railway board of adjustment No. 2 or any four members of railway board of adjustment No. 3, depending upon the board considering the matter, may elect to refer the matter upon which no decision has been reached to the proper commission on labor disputes for a final decision.

"Each railway board of adjustment shall keep a complete and accurate record of all matters submitted for its consideration and of all decisions made by the board.

"Each railway board of adjustment shall file a report of all cases decided, including the decision, with the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the chief operating officer of the carrier affected, and with the chief executive officers of the organizations concerned.

"SEC. 301. Within 30 days from the passage of this act there shall be created and established three commissions, which shall be known and designated as commission on labor disputes No. 1, commission on labor disputes No. 2, and commission on labor disputes No. 3, in the following manner:

"Commission on labor disputes No. 1 shall consist of eight members, four of whom shall be selected by the carriers subject to the provisions of this act and four who shall be the chief executive officers of the organizations of employees, or some person designated by them, hereinbefore mentioned in connection with the creation of railway board of adjustment No. 1.

"Commission on labor disputes No. 2 shall consist of 12 members, 6 of whom shall be selected by the carriers subject to the provisions of this act and 6 who shall be the chief executive officers of the organizations of employees, or some person designated by them, hereinbefore mentioned in connection with the creation of railway board of adjustment No. 2.

"Commission on labor disputes No. 3 shall consist of eight members, four of whom shall be selected by the carriers subject to the provisions of this act and four who shall be the chief executive officers of the organizations of employees, or some person designated by them, hereinbefore mentioned in connection with the creation of railway board of adjustment No. 3.

"It shall be unlawful for any member of a railway board of adjustment or any member of a commission on labor disputes to be a member at the same time of any other board or commission herein provided for, nor shall he act as a member of any commission on labor disputes in any case in which he took part during its presentation and consideration before any railway board of adjustment herein provided for.

"Any controversy growing out of questions of wages, interpretation or application of the provisions of wage schedules or agreements, discipline or personal grievances of the employees, arising on any carrier line subject to this act on which no agreement has been reached by railway board of adjustment No. 1, or railway board of adjustment No. 2, or railway board of adjustment No. 3 may be referred to the commission on labor disputes No. 1, or commission on labor disputes No. 2, or commission on labor disputes No. 3, respectively, for final action.

"The commissions on labor disputes shall meet in the city of Washington within 10 days after the selection of their members and elect a chairman and vice chairman, who shall be members of the commission. The chairman or vice chairman will preside at all meetings of the commission and both shall be required to vote upon the adoption of all decisions of the commission.

"The commissions shall meet at such time as is deemed necessary and continue in session until matters referred to them are disposed of.

"Unless otherwise mutually agreed, all meetings of the commissions shall be held in the city of Washington: Provided, That the commissions shall have authority to conduct hearings and pass upon controversies when properly submitted, at any place designated by the commissions.

"Should a vacancy occur in either of the commissions from any cause such vacancy shall immediately be filled by the same appointive authority which made the original selection.

"A commission on labor disputes shall render decisions on all matters in dispute as provided herein when properly submitted to such commission.

"No matter will be considered by a commission on labor disputes unless officially referred to it in the manner herein prescribed.

"In hearings before a commission, in matters properly submitted for its consideration, the carrier shall be represented by such person or persons as may be designated by the chief operating officer and the employees shall be represented by such person or persons as may be designated by the chief executive officer of the organization concerned.

"The clerical and office expenses of the commissions will be paid by the United States Government. The carrier directly concerned and the organization involved in the hearing will, respectively, assume any expenses incurred in presenting a case.

"Each commission on labor disputes shall keep a complete and correct record of all matters submitted for its consideration and all decisions made by the commission.

"A commission will have authority to hear and decide only such cases as are properly referred to it by the railway boards of adjustment. All decisions of a commission on labor disputes shall be approved by a majority vote of all members of the commission.

"A report of all cases decided, including the decisions, shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the chief officer of the carrier affected, and with the chief executive officers of the organizations concerned.

"Additional boards of adjustment and commissions on labor disputes may be organized from time to time to cover other employees or classes of employees under the provisions of this act.

"For the purpose of making this section effective the members of railway boards of adjustment or commissions on labor disputes, or either of them, shall have the power to administer oaths and affirmations, sign subpœnas, require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents material to a just determination of any matter under investigation, and may invoke the aid of the United States courts to compel witnesses to attend and testify and to produce such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents, to the same extent and under the same conditions and penalties as are provided for in the act to regulate commerce.

"Testimony before railway boards of adjustment or commissions on labor disputes shall be given under oath or affirmation when it is deemed necessary by such boards or commissions. Any railway board of adjustment or commission on labor disputes may employ such assistants as may be necessary in carrying on this work. Any railway board of adjustment or commission on labor disputes shall, whenever practicable, be supplied with suitable quarters in any Federal building located at its place of meeting or at any place to which it may adjourn for its deliberations.

"The United States Railroad Administration and the Board of Mediation and Conciliation are hereby authorized to turn over to railway boards of adjustment or to the commissions on labor disputes upon request any properties or documents heretofore filed with them and bearing upon mediation, arbitration, or other adjustments or proceedings held under the provisions of the act approved June 1, 1898, or the act approved July 15, 1913, providing for mediation and arbitration, or decisions rendered by the United States Railroad Administration.

"The sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be immediately available and continue available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, for the necessary and proper expenses incurred in connection with carrying on the work of railway boards of adjustment and commissions on labor disputes, including rent in the District of Columbia, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, assistants, clerical work, and other necessary expenses to be approved by the chairmen of the railway boards of adjustment and commissions on labor disputes and audited by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury.

"Any person, corporation, organization, or association violating any of the provisions of sections 300 and 301 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense on conviction shall pay to the United States a penalty of $500."

Mr. BLACK (interrupting the reading of the Anderson amendment). Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not an amendment, but is in the nature of a substitute for the substitute, and is, therefore, out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is an amendment to the substitute by striking out all after certain portions of the substitute and inserting something else.

Mr. WEBSTER. I want to present the other side of this question by suggesting that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] proposes to strike out my entire substitute. The portion designated by him is the first section in it, and he moves to strike out all after the numbering of the first section of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands, and overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Anderson amendment.

Mr. JUUL (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. It is somewhat unusual to interrupt the reading of an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask if it will be in order either to request or to move that this substitute now being read and the substitute to which this is a substitute be both printed in the RECORD to-night and placed in the hands of the Members to-morrow morning.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to have that done.

Mr. JUUL. I would dislike to be compelled to vote on so intricate a matter without thoroughly understanding it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to make that request on the completion of the reading of the amendment. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Anderson amendment.

Mr. ESCH (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the amendment, now being read, may be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the remainder of the amendment that had been offered and is now being read may be considered as having been read, and may be printed in the RECORD as having been read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD as having been offered in full.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the great importance of this labor title and the sections under it, I ask unanimous consent that any gentleman who desires to offer an amendment either to the title or to the sections under the title be permitted to have his amendment presented now and, without it being read, have it printed in the RECORD, so that they will all be before us in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Members having amendments to Title III may present them at the Clerk's desk now and have them printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the two substitutes, the one offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and the one offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] may be printed in bill form so that the Members may have them in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] and the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] may be printed in bill form for the use of Members. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not do that. Some of us have not very good eyesight.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the objection. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether we could not come to an agreement to-night as to the amount of debate we will require on these propositions that are now presented or upon any amendment which might be presented. I suggest that the time be limited to an hour and a half.

Mr. BARKLEY. To be divided in what manner?

Mr. ESCH. We could allow one-third of the time for each proposition, the time to be at the disposal of Mr. ANDERSON on the proposition he has presented, Judge WEBSTER for the proposition he has presented, and some member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the proposition contained in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that is a little unfair to the committee because, on the part of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, we have to defend our proposition against both of those, and we will have to do it in one-third of the time granted to other Members for offering their substitutes. I think the committee ought to be in charge of half the time.

Mr. ESCH. I think this is true, in view of the fact that the committee is the proponent of the proposition and all others are opponents of the same proposition, and the time should be equally divided. I think the suggestion of the gentleman is well taken.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not preferred a unanimous-consent request yet.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield to me? Does not the gentleman think that this is rather unfair to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, that you give him only the same amount of time as to the proponents of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington, inasmuch as they consumed some time on that amendment—20 minutes or so? This is a very important amendment, and I think a little over 30 minutes ought to be allowed for its discussion.

Mr. ESCH. This is in reference to general debate I am suggesting. We will all have the same opportunity. I do not want to discriminate at all, but I think the committee should be entitled to half the time, in view of the fact that we proposed the legislation and these other propositions are by way of amendment to the committee proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. This is for general debate and does not interfere with the consideration of the bill and amendments thereto under the five-minute rule?

Mr. ESCH. No; because there will be amendments, no doubt, offered to whatever proposition may be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was going to ask the gentleman whether the request will be that debate be limited to the two substitutes now before the committee——

Mr. ESCH. On the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Or to the entire title.

Mr. ESCH. It would necessarily involve a discussion of the title as presented in the bill because they would have to show the difference between their bills and the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. But this agreement, if entered into, does not preclude other Members of the House, if these propositions are voted down, from then having time to debate on the amendments offered to various sections of our proposal?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. So the gentleman's request would be limited to the substitutes that are now or may hereafter be offered as a whole in place of our proposal?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr GARLAND. Does not the gentleman think under the present circumstances and with present conditions, in view of the fact that the amendment which has just been read was not considered in general debate before and both of the other amendments were considered in general debate, and that none of us have had an opportunity prior to this particular amendment to discuss it in general, that there ought to be a much longer time. There are a lot of us who got no opportunity at all to speak in general debate on any part of the bill. Therefore I think we ought to have an opportunity on this particular section in which we are interested.

Mr. ESCH. Would the gentleman be satisfied if I extended the time to two hours? That will give ample time.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, many of us who are not members of the committee have thousands of railway employees in our districts and those employees expect to hear from their Members here as to what views we have upon this very interesting proposition to them.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yielded the floor to me.

The CHAIRMAN. This is all by unanimous consent.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and such business as may come before the House under the rule, that debate continue on the substitute propositions that have been read to-night for a period of two hours, the time to be divided equally between a representative of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and some one to represent the substitutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the debate upon the pending amendments be limited to two hours——

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Chair will state that the gentleman can move to limit debate, but can not in his motion provide for how the time shall be controlled. If the gentleman desires to move the time of debate on the amendments be limited to two hours——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say again——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] desire to offer a motion to fix time for debate upon the pending amendment?

Mr. ESCH. I move that the time be fixed at three hours.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [The Chair proceeded to count.]

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think we ought to fix the time to-night. This is the most important matter in the whole bill. Let us sleep on it to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is out of order. The Chair was ascertaining whether or not there was a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] moves that all debate on the pending amendments to section 300 of the bill be limited to three hours.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it understood that the debate is confined to the two substitutes and does not affect the original bill as presented to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin provided for that, namely, that all debate on the pending amendments to section 300 and on section 300 shall be limited to three hours. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Can a motion to close debate be made until at least five minutes of debate has been had on the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been 10 minutes of debate on the section.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Has there been any debate on the amendments offered?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary that debate shall be had on amendments offered.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I make the point of no quorum, if it is going to be attempted by this little gathering to fix this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will again count. [After counting.] Ninety-two Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Cerk will call the roll.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. COOPER as Speaker pro tempore having assumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called; whereupon 168 Members—a quorum—had answered to their names, and he submitted a list of absentees for printing in the RECORD and the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present, and the committee will resume its sitting.

Thereupon the committee resumed its session.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on section 300 and the substitutes that have been offered be limited to three hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the debate upon the substitutes which have been offered and upon section 300, in Title III, be limited to three hours. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FESS as Speaker pro tempore having assumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the continuing order, until to-morrow, Friday, November 14, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.
